Today with our pushbutton economy the male attribute of strength is downgraded and the female attribute of stamina is upgraded (cf. p.54)

Vacuum created by woman's Exodus from the home into the economic field as co-provider must be filled by the male's dormant attribute of paternity. (cf. p.57)

VI Downgrading of Maternity and Upgrading of Paternity

The revolutionary factor - Simultaneous Manifestations of female economic independence together with sociological apathy in regards to contraceptives, single standard sexual license (cf. p.54)

VII GROWTH PATTERNS

A. Pattern I Periods of Infancy, Youth and Adulthood.

(1) INFANCY - Total dependence. Acceptance of authority. Essentials the material - food, clothing, shelter; learns bodily functions. Needs love to thrive.

(2) YOUTH AGE OF REVOLT - Partial dependence. Assumes some responsibilities but not ready for parental obligations. Active Cultivation of mind and preparation for future job. Puberty. Loving Heavenly Father.

(3) ADULTHOOD - Physical Maturity, but not necessarily mentally and spiritually mature. Complete independence, depending on capability of Assumption of full obligations. Absolute trust not a blind faith accepting God's judgment, after giving one's own a thorough workout. Emergence of conjugal love.

B. Pattern II Domain and Group Participation

(1) INFANCY - Limited domain - home one group participation family.

(2) YOUTH - widening domain and increasing of group participation.

(3) MATURITY - World-wide domain and participation in a multiplicity of groups. Family Community, Nation, U. N., Lodge, Grange, Club, Church, Race, Credo.

When we trace the growth patterns of infancy, youth and maturity as evidenced whether it be as individuals, family, nations, the white, yellow or black race or in mankind as a whole, it becomes immediately apparent that the human race is in the youth stage. God's reason for providing us with all these interlocking growth patterns and man's relatively short tenure of finite existence, also becomes apparent. Every adult has experienced the difficult problems of immaturity in his youth and is thus enabled to recognize these same problems. As encountered in the continuity growth patterns of nations and the human race. (cf. p.46)

The adjustment problems as experienced by the individual in puberty and adolescence (cf. Str. Frwk. VII A2) are analagous to the problems encountered by the male and female with the emergence of conjugal love in family relationships. (cf. Str. Frwk. VI B2 (b) (c))

VIII GROUP PATTERNS

A. Four Kingdoms - (1) mineral (2) plant (3) animal (4) man

1. Man is man and not just another animal. The Growth Pattern of man is one of ever-widening domain and participation in an ever-increasing multiplicity of groups. No animal has such a growth pattern.

B. Diversity of Groups. Race, nationality, culture, creed, credo, sect, ideology. Provide both the material and opportunity for the theorization and experimentation. Progress depends on initiative and ingenuity. Obviously no one group could encompass or utilize all available material provided with infinite choice. Some groups have to make the mistakes, some have to be sacrificed for the good of the rest. We have been witnessing such a period of theorization and experimentation, which has brought us to the place where if we so choose, we can consolidate our gains. The final judgment rests in God's hands.

IX CONTINUITY PATTERNS - A-Inanimate; B-Animate; C-Infinite

A. INANIMATE
(1) Astronomical
(2) Geological
(3) Paleontological

B. ANIMATE - Biological II Plants III Animals IV Man
(1) Botanical
(2) Zoological
(3) Anthropological

a. Evolution data. At the time the original data was compiled the Science of Genetics was non-existant. As far as the data is concerned it would be difficult to overestimate its value in our fund of knowledge.

I'm sorry that I cannot give this same unqualified approval of either the 'Theory of Evolution' or the Theorists. Admittedly the original propounders were constrained by extenuating influences.

It's the evolver of today with a theory that doesn't need God to explain it that amazes me utterly. From the way he explained the evolving part it sounded to me as if he didn't need God to explain him either.

Leaving God out is only 3/4 of it. The other 1/4 is whether he is counting me in or out, in the evolving part. But in or out, God is. I am. The Sputniks are. But the theory just isn't.

Since the Book of Genesis was written has the Human Race or any part of it ever made one serious attempt of comprehending our Creator with the infinite love using his handiwork, our world, and what we know about it, as a basis for comprehension. (cf. p.33)

Collectively down through the Ages we have amassed the data but individually we have been so busy collecting and preening ourselves as collectors that we never have got around to pooling all the data for the avowed purpose of finding out what we could have concerning creation and our Creator. (cf. p.33)

The Scientists of Evolution compiled literally tons of data concerning Creation, but left out the Creator. And the Christians have given us the concept of a loving Heavenly Father and left out Creation. (cf. p.33)

When I started this job I thought I could cram Creation onto a few pages; Moses had done it in one Chapter. My naivete is so apparent that I should be abashed. I'm not, for the Experts have been so concerned with the authenticity of the Holy Scriptures and the Validity of vision and revelations that they have overlooked the irrefutable fact of preservation, in spite of incalcuable odds. (cf. p.56,33) These Holy Scriptures have been a guide to mankind down through the Ages of infancy, early childhood and we are still trying to use them. With our experts leaving out our Creator and Christian authorities leaving out Creation, is it any wonder that we have a cockeyed world? Let us return to our Structural Framework and find out for ourselves where we fit in.

B. IV MAN

(1) Ethnological - Man Evolutionary Patterns (cf. p.56)

a. Civilizations, racial, cultural, national, ethical, etc.

b. Genealogical

1. Sporadic civilizations
2. Family trees
3. Biblical Begats
4. Father, Son - Father

C. Heavenly Father, Earthly Son - Heavenly Father (cf. p.56)

(1) Jesus' Conception and Birth

(2) Dramatization of Crucifixion (cf. p.56)

(3) Resurrection with publicity which insured Witnesses.

ATTENTION, PLEASE!

IF CHRIST HAD BEEN AN EARTHLY FATHER, THE CONTINUITY PATTERN OF HEAVENLY FATHER - EARTHLY SON - HEAVENLY FATHER WOULD HAVE BEEN BROKEN. JESUS WAS DENIED THE ECSTASIES OF CONJUGAL LOVE AND THE SATISFACTION OF FAMILY LIFE AND CHILDREN. "DOCTRINE OF APPEASEMENT" SEEMS UTTERLY INCONGROUS WITH OUR CONCEPT WITH A LOVING EARTHLY FATHER. (cf. p.57)

X ORIENTATION (cf. p.34,35,56)

Our problem is one of Orientation. It is not one of adaptation or evolving as our evolutionists would have us believe. God using His infinite powers has provided us with the proof of His love and concern on so vast a scale that even a glimmer leaves us breathless.

(1) God could have given us a world without infinite variation with only one kind of animal, tree, plant, flower, and with all of us looking alike and thinking the same thoughts. We wouldn't have liked such a world. We don't like monotony.

(2) God had He so chosen, could have given us a world without conjugal love, as Christ's conception demonstrates.

(3) God has given us a planned and orderly Universe with our atoms operating in a characteristic manner, within defined limits that enable us to both predict and duplicate. He needn't have.

You are a little man at one end of a crowbar with a great big boulder on the other. Can you budge it? Not even a wiggle. Now you go get yourself a little rock and put it in under the crowbar, and then you explain to me what that little rock has that you didn't have that makes the big boulder jump around? Do you think the little rock told our Archimedes its SECRET? Our job is to learn to utilize our faculties and recognize our opportunities. It is not simply the question of "Being in the right place at the right time". As one of our VIP's has stated, it also requires (a) having the brain, (b) wisdom, (c) the opportunity to make the wise choice, (d) the making of the choice, (e) the will to go into action.

A five-year-old, when complimented for her memory, summed it up in these words, "Yes, I have a good memberer when I member to use it."

Oreintation - is finding out what we can do and what we can't. We've got to know our finite limitations - the domain in which we can operate our Freedom of Choice.

Now what do we mean by a finite domain? It means it has limits - the infinite doesn't have any.

EVERYTHING IN THE FINITE DOMAIN IS MADE OF ATOMS - ABSOLUTELY EVERYTHING.

Our bodies are made of atoms and as long as we are in our bodies, we can't go beyond the bounds of the atoms. We can operate machines but we can't operate our atoms. God operates them. We can choose to walk but whether we walk or not depends on God. When the atoms don't operate we call it "Technical Malfunction". The crystal had a flaw. (cf. p.34,35)

XI CONCEPT I - We attribute the creation and operation of our world to a supreme intelligence; all powerful, benevolent and just. (cf. p.6)

A. World opinion has crystallized. The people of the world have signified their agreement that we need no more concrete proof in deeds for the justification of our fears. (1) coercion, (2) the arbitrary uses of the forces of destruction, that are available to mankind, in the exercise of Freedom of Choice.

What we need is a "Justification For Our Faith". What we need is restoration of faith in our Creator, in ourselves, and in each other and appreciation of God for His faith in us and the wonderful world he has given us. (cf. p.5)

When Moses, Guatma and other inspired thinkers attempted to reconcile the reality of the horrible with the source of all goodness, they resorted to the mythical concept of the devil as long as the human race was in its infancy this concept sufficed. The infant accepts the dictates of authority, it does not question them.

Just before my son went overseas he said to me, "Mother, God just can't be the way you say He is. No decent man on earth would let these horrible things happen if he could prevent them." My son could not accept my say so. The faith that had sufficed for me in my youth didn't fulfill his needs. I knew in my heart that God just had to be a Loving Heavenly Father. But my eyes were blind to the evidence. He set forth to face the ordeals ahead with only his faith in himself and a mother's prayer. PLEASE GOD take care of him! He won't ask you to do it, but you understand why he won't. "God did." The fact that I had failed my dearly beloved son was a horrible bitter cup to drink and I, "being what I am" would never have been reconciled as Jesus was in simply doing God's will. I had to know Why God was not punishing me for my sins. God had to put me through this suffering. If He hadn't willed me to suffer, I wouldn't have had any reason to find out why.

B. I had to learn the reason for sacrifice before I could give it to you. (cf. Foreword "IF")

God brought my son back safe and sound. He didn't make me suffer one bit more than was necessary. But what of the mothers whose sons didn't come back? Why were these supreme sacrifices necessary?

It is up to those of us who have suffered and survived to see that not one bit of God's Gift is wasted. It is we, the wives and mothers, who sat for hours with pen in hand and a blank page before us trying to think of a cheery message to send a man that might at that very moment be gasping out his last breath in a far distant land; it is we who must take the initiative. It is we that must act while those memories are still fresh in our minds. Some of us had to be sacrificed for the good of the rest. It is up to us, with God's help, to see that the cost of the sacrifice was worth the price that we paid.

We all know that WAR is HELL. (cf. p.36,45)

The Structural Framework of our Universe provides the proof that war is obsolete, the use of violence to secure our material needs was in the Age of Infancy.

The Human Race HAS to LEARN that lesson.

(1) Because of the threat of war and annihilation we have witnessed in ten years a technological achievement that would have taken a hundred years or more. (cf. p.45)

(2) The doom of annihilation would not now be hovering over our heads if even one-tenth of the people in our Christian democracy really believed that God and not the Kremlin is running this world and had the guts to act on their convictions.

(3) What the WHITE RACE needs to recognize is that as far as progress of the human race is concerned, IT IS DISPENSABLE, just as were sporadic types of civilization in the past; that God will not hesitate to SACRIFICE us if, in His judgment, it is necessary to teach the human race the folly of the peoples who place their reliance on material things and who will compromise with their consciences for the sake of expediency.

(4) God has given us the knowledge of the good and bad uses of the atom and the FREEDOM OF CHOICE.

(a) The Technological knowledge and mass production will provide the essentials of infancy. For the segment of the human race and give them the time for their intellectual and spiritual pursuits as they mature.

C. I would like to assure those of you who believe that God created our wonderful world and then turned it over to the devil to operate, that it is neither my intention nor my desire to disturb you. It is to those who have not found these concepts of the devil and our Creator compatible, that I wish to speak.

(1) Let's head for the "Path of Enlightenment" (cf. p.5)
(a) By finding out just how much is due the devil.
(b) Just who the devil is.

(2) Jesus gave the the prayer to our HEAVENLY FATHER. In the prayer we ask "Lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil". We are praying to God not to the devil. God has given us a world of infinite variety from which to choose, both good and evil. We can make the wise or unwise choice. That is 'temptation'. God will help us if we ask Him to make the wise choice. 'He will deliver us from evil.'

(3) Can you find one single place in the Structural Framework of the Universe where God has needed the devil's help?

To enable those of you who feel the need of an informed faith to recognize that personal experience is in accord with the facts of reality and with the implications of the momentous events, both ominous and inspirational, that have been transpiring before our eyes, during God's preparation of us for the launching of our Enterprise. (cf. p. Attention Please, and p.9,3,22)

In addition to the lists itemized on p.3 and 22, I suggest that you check the timing of the launching with current issues that are now on our agenda. Here are a few examples:

(a) Controlled disarmament versus total disarmament
(b) Refugee Year - Peace Mobiles
(c) Birth Control - Planned Parenthood
(d) Civil Rights - Preference of One's Own Kind
(e) Integration and Segregation - Man's Dual Role
(f) Foreign Aid - Token Disarmament - Peace Mobiles
(g) Surpluses, etc. - Peace
(h) Better Understanding - Doing unto others as THEY would be done unto

XII Concept II We accept the testimony of millions who from personal experience believe that direct contact with our Creator, demonstrated through the media of prayer, conscience, and in other ways, is sufficient evidence. (cf. p.6,35)

Three other ways are the clues for happy living. (cf. p.34)

(1) The Miracles of Coincidence
(2) The Sirens and Signals
(3) The Key to ALL SICKNESS, SUFFERING, TWINGE AND PANG IS WRONG THINKING - making the wrong choice.

It is essential that we be ever on the alert for these signals from God. What we have to recognize is that everything that happens has significance, that it happens because God arranges for it to happen and conditions us for its reception.

XIII Concept III We regard death as a transition and that one's conduct on EARTH is but a preparation for what's beyond. (cf. p.6,35)

God has provided the continuity patterns in our universe which give us our concepts of eternity and life everlasting. (cf. p.56)

A. Christ's mission on earth to provide the evidence. (cf. p.56)

1. The Loving Heavenly Father
2. The Earthly Son - The 'Loving Heavenly Father'
3. Our Heavenly Father demonstrated His love of the human race with the sacrifice of His dearly beloved Son to provide the evidence of life everlasting.
4. Proved that the mental and spiritual attributes are retained in the life beyond.
5. That our tenure on earth is restricted only to the finite limitations of existence in the physical attributes of the individual with death affording the release from these imposed finite restrictions.
6. That the LIFE BEYOND affords unrestricted opportunity for the development of the mental and spiritual endowment.
   (a) We now have the age of automation. Ahead of us is the AGE OF ANIMATION.
      (1) Animation is an attribute of life; inanimation of death (cf. p.63)
      (2) PEACE will provide the funds and the facilities for the investigations of death (a) the inanimate, (b) parapsychological and (c) phantasms - ghosts. (cf. p.63). Death is within the finite domain; atom bound.

   To Christ this mission was worth the cost of the sacrifice and He was willing to pay the price. (cf. p.56)

B. The Isolated Segments (cf. p.46) or Sporadic Civilizations have provided us with the philosophies, scientific discoveries and religious concepts necessary for the progress of the human race as a whole. As has been pointed out, these sporadic groups had been relieved of the pressures of physical survival or had advanced beyond the age of infancy.

C. When we trace the growth patterns of infancy, youth and maturity as evidenced, whether it be as individuals, family, nation, the white, yellow, brown, red or black races, or in mankind as a whole, it becomes immediately apparent
1. That the human race is in the Youth stage.
2. The human race has only reached maturity in the development of the body or physical.
3. That God, with the operation of our atoms and His Gift, has provided us with the opportunity of development mentally and spiritually. It is up to us, exercising our 'Freedom of Choice', to use our allotted time in the preparation for the 'Life Beyond'.

D. God's reason for providing us with brevity of finite existence or the relatively short tenure on earth is apparent.

XIV Concept IV We believe that effort invested in doing God's will yields the greatest returns in self-interest.

GOD'S GIFT

The marvelous prospects in 1960 for a peace without duress but with dividends.

This gift package of God's love, the balms of peace, should be examined carefully. We will find on inspection no atom or hydrogen bombs hidden within its pages. We will not need any of the CIA or Pentagon experts to reassure us.

The balms of peace are in God's hands. This gift package and the timing of its launchings is convincing proof that God controls the destiny of mankind.

It's hard to believe (cf. p.10 - Modus Operandi, written in 1956) but who can deny in the face of all of this evidence 'that God has provided millions and millions of dollars without its costing anybody one cent extra.' SIMPLY FOR TRYING TO DO THESE THINGS AS GOD WISHES THEM TO BE DONE.

"We know that men, money and know-how are all available, all ready for us to take the next great step up the 'Path of Enlightenment'."

This is our first concept.

Belief that God, with His Infinite power, is now operating the Universe in accordance with His plan. That no matter what we choose to do, individually or in groups, whether constructive or destructive, the calendar of events will progress in orderly sequence. Individually or as nations, we may be out of step, but mankind as a whole is definitely on the march.

In God's judgment we have become of age.

God has entrusted nations with the instruments for Peace or War. Will we choose wisely? Will we prove worthy of God's trust? Enough of us will. Otherwise God wouldn't have trusted us, for He knows.

Do we need to worry about those who can't be trusted to make the wise choice?

Can we ever again be in doubt as to Whom is running this World?

This is no time for pussy-footing.

It is the time for Forceful and Determined and Unified Action.

The Hour of Decision is at Hand.

NO MATTER WHERE WE TURN, RECENT EVENTS CLEARLY MARK THE PATH.

Let us show by our deeds that we put our faith in God, trusting to his judgment, and leave the fate of those who succumb to their weakness and place reliance on brute force in the hands of our Creator.

Peace in Operation - the God-given opportunity for their Performance!

You weren't ready to receive and I wasn't ready to tell you. I thought I had all the keys and didn't have the half. I tried to tell but the things weren't ready for telling. I thought I could cram the story of creation in a few pages - it had been done once in a single chapter. Every Scripture, every scroll, every word of sage or scientists, prophet or philosopher that has been preserved for us down through the ages holds clues for living the "Good Life". We the people need not concern ourselves with their authenticity or source, whether prophesy or myth. What concerns us is that they have been PRESERVED. And absolutely nobody can deny that evidence.

Why have they been preserved? What is our Creator telling us? And we're never going to hear God if we keep on wraggling about various translations. Let's have a look at all of them. If they are there we need them all. What will suit one person's taste and needs will disturb another. Let's not forget that our Creator can be all things to man. That He is the Creator and can be the loving father, if that is what we need Him to be.

What do all of us all over the world today need more than anything else?

Isn't it the need for concrete evidence that our Creator IS a loving Heavenly Father, concerned with our individual needs, and that our world was designed and is operated for the purpose of supplying and providing us with the means of securing those needs, physically, mentally and spiritually, during our tenure on earth and for the "Life Beyond"?

If we could be absolutely certain in our minds that no matter what happens to us, God is letting it happen for a good reason, wouldn't we then have the courage to stand up and take whatever He handed out? Of course we would. You see, God knows our needs and has presented the evidence just when we most sorely need it. We are ready to listen now. We weren't last December. (This was written prior to the NATO Conference, 1957) and as you can see now the hands were still not ready to receive.

Collectively we have amassed the evidence down through the ages, but individually we have been so busy collecting and preening ourselves as collectors that we never have got around to pooling all the data for the avowed purpose of finding out what we could have concerning creation and our Creator.

As far as I know we haven't even got around to recognizing our needs - the two instincts:

1. The thirst for knowledge - the wanting to know; to find out.
2. Spiritual hungers - the needs of love.
   a. The need to be important to someone - to be appreciated.
   b. The need to understand and to be understood.
   c. The need to love and be loved.

These are the essentials to Happiness and while acquiring them the Human race will lay the foundation stones for a Peaceful World.

Since the Book of Genesis was written, has the Human Race or any part of it ever made one serious attempt of comprehending our Creator with His infinite love, using His handiwork, our world and what we know about it, as a basis for comprehension?

The scientists of evolution compiled literally tons of data concerning creation, but left out the Creator. And the Christians have done the same with the concept of a loving Heavenly Father and left out Creation. Is it any wonder we have a cock-eyed world? What if the assignment for working out our Divine Heritage had been given to the F.B.I. instead of to me? Just what kind of a Divine Heritage would we have had if, instead of using the snowflakes, the leaves and the sunsets, it had been derived from the infinite variation of finger-prints to be found in the F.B.I.'s criminal files?

Collectively we have the evidence. What use we make of it is the concern of all of us. But it is up to each one of us as individuals to see that not one bit of this evidence is wasted, that every bit gets on the record. Just because everyone of us is different and has had a life time of experiences, everyone of us has something to contribute to our combined knowledge of what God is doing for us personally.

We've got to stop and listen - be on the alert. There are three ways that God communicates with us through our subconscious minds, besides the media of prayer and conscience (as stated in Concept 2) - "We accept the testimony of millions who, from personal experience believe that direct contact with our Creator, demonstrated through the media of prayer, conscience, and in other ways, is sufficient evidence."

1. Not all of us know how to pray. We've got to learn to tune in.
2. We've got to take our consciences out of the deep-freeze and thaw them out.

The three other ways are as follows: MYRIADS OF CLUES (previously referred to)

1. The miracles of coincidence - the "it just happeneds".
   The chance word; the chance meeting; the Biblical passage; the untraceable telephone call that saved a life.
2. The sirens and signals. The frustrations and encouragements.
   a. The red lights and the green.
   b. The "ups and downs"; the "pins and the pricks"; the slips into place and the slides out from under.
   c. The wrong and the right side of the bed.
   d. The successes and failures.
   e. The joys and the sorrows.

These are just a few of the ways God uses to help us find the road to happiness. Don't you think it would be a good idea to find out about them?

3. And here is the third way of God's for guiding us along the road to health and happiness. The KEY to ALL SICKNESS, SUFFERING, TWINGE AND PANG IS WRONG THINKING - making the wrong choice.

I knew this back in December 1956, but God hadn't yet told me the "how and why". And when you hear it, you are going to be as glad as I am, that He did not let me tell you just the part that I knew then.

Both Psychosomatic medicine and Christian Science are on the right track, but neither go far enough. The proponents of Psychosomatic medicine have linked up worry with ulcers, and fear with the cardiacs, but have failed to recognize the links between every single kind of wrong-thinking and all the twinges and pangs. The Christian Scientists have concentrated on the right-thinking, regarding all wrong thinking and the twinges and pangs as error, which they have tried to deny or ignore, instead of recognizing that they were in two different categories. That God uses pain and suffering to alert us to the fact that something is wrong in our thinking that requires our attention. And most of us just don't do anything about it unless it's pretty horrible.

It is as if the Firemen just hung up the telephone when alerted, instead of going to the fire and putting it out.

Before a single one of us can be really healthy and happy we've got to find out what it takes to make us that way. This is each one's personal responsibility and our Creator isn't going to give us any Peace until we start finding out.

SO LET'S START! Let's examine the evidence!

First we want to know what we can do and what we can't. We've got to know our finite limitations, the domain in which we can operate our Freedom of Choice, where we can do our right-thinking - the will to do, or volition. Now what do we mean by a finite domain? It means it has limits - the infinite doesn't have any.

Everything in the finite domain is made of atoms -- absolutely everything!

Our bodies are made of atoms and as long as we are in our bodies, we can't go beyond the bounds of the atoms.

We can operate machines but we can't operate our atoms and what's more, we wouldn't want to - we wouldn't have time to do anything else. That's why God operates the atoms in our circulatory, respiratory, excretory, digestive and reflex systems and leaves only the nervous system as our responsibility. Man can choose to walk but whether he walks or not depends on his atoms, and God operates the atoms.

The atoms don't cooperate when we make the wrong choice. When we do the wrong thinking - when we worry, fear, hate -- we have ulcers, angina and asthma. But it isn't only in the big opportunities that we can do the wrong thinking. There is the procrastinating, the holier-than-thou, and the self-pitying.

There is the time when you feel abused because you have to do the ironing; and you burn yourself. When you get up too late and you are worrying about getting the family off - the toast burns, the milk spills and the coffee scalds your mouth.

Test this out for yourself - don't take my word for it. Take each twinge and pang as they happen and try right then, while they are fresh in your mind, to trace them back to the thoughts you were thinking. What were you doing that needed alerting in your conscienceness? These are the times when the atoms don't cooperate. There is the short-circuit. The fuses blow. The pipes burst. The circulatory, the respiratory and the digestive systems balk.

If we didn't suffer we wouldn't seek to stop the suffering, and it is in finding the ways to stop the suffering that we learn how to live and do the things that make life worthwhile.

As long as man is atom-bound, he can't go beyond the atom. It is in the mental and spiritual domain that we have no limits - that we are free to develop our capacities; and it is here that our responsibility lies.

And our Creator has so fashioned us, with the automation of our atoms, to give us the freedom to develop mentally and spiritually.

In our evaluation of the evidence that has been compiled since the first chapter of Genesis was written, it is essential that we keep in mind "man's dual role". Able as an individual to stand on his own two feet and, at one and the same time, to stretch out his hands and clasp the hands of others, as a member of a multiplicity of groups. In this case, those of family, nation and race.

It is man's performance, in these multiple roles, as an individual and as a participating member in family, race and nation, that provides the unmistakeable evidence of the "Life Beyond" and our Creator - The Divine PROVIDER, Protector and loving Heavenly Father.

With the familiar and similar growth and evolutionary patterns of these four roles, as enacted in the periods of birth, infancy, youth, maturity; and with death as the prospective termination of finite existence, continuity is the dominant theme. At varying time intervals, affording the opportunities of comparison, we are enabled to comprehend the SIGNIFICANCE of the BREVITY of the INDIVIDUAL'S TENURE ON EARTH.

With these developmental processes going on before our eyes, together with the mass of information of past performances that has been preserved for us in the Holy Scriptures of various religions and other historical documents, the evolutionary data collected in the diverse scientific studies of the inanimate as well as the animate - our Creator confronts us with evidence on such a vast scale that merely to contemplate the immensity leaves one breathless.

What are the conclusions that we can draw from this evidence? We regard death as a transition, and that one's conduct on Earth is but a preparation for what's beyond.

1. That our world of infinite variation, environmentally and individually provides us with the opportunity to develop ourselves physically, mentally and spiritually, if we choose to use what our Creator makes available.
2. That during tenure on earth, while in our finite bodies, it is possible only to attain complete physical maturity, since both mental and spiritual development are subject to the limitations of our atom operated bodies and brain capacity and structure.
3. That if we as a peoples choose to squander our substance and our allotted time in riotous living instead of harnessing our faculties to worthwhile endeavors as the civilizations of old, whose sacrifice was necessary, in order that we might learn the wrong way and profit by their mistakes. Those past civilizations let their ripened fruit rot on the trees. Today we pick the fruit before it's ripe and put it in cold storage. They had decadency. We have dry rot and senility.

There were, undoubtedly, those amongst those past civilizations who were wise and learned enough to realize the folly of those populations but, for the most part, the peoples did not know. Today we have no such excuse. Even the peoples of the most under-developed countries know what is right. And I believe that they also know that it is to their advantage to deter the white race from taking the fool-hardy road to destruction.

Someone has to get the traffic moving in the opposite direction on our Super-Duper Highway. We are going to need a lot of help, but there is a whale of a lot to be salvaged. Let us not forget for one moment that someone has to make the mistakes, but they they will not be in vain, if we profit from them. And furthermore, just because an experiment fails to produce the desired results with one goal in mind doesn't mean that the experimentation was a failure. All it takes to make it a success is to find out where it fits. All the experiments in the development of our Missile Program, whether by Army, Navy or Airforce which have not proven feasible, but the things learned will, if we ever get to the point where we will conserve our knowledge and resources for some useful purpose.

The human race needs the urgency and threat of war to spur it into its peaceful activities. We have to learn our lesson -- "That Peace with Duress and Deficits is preposterous". That God has given us "ATOMIC POWER for the good of all mankind." Whether we can only learn the lesson the hard way is for us to decide.

Before leaving the discussion of past civilizations, let us consider another one of our Creator's reasons for providing and preserving the historical data concerning them.

This is the lesson -- that only when a portion of the people (generally the ruling class or crown) has acquired mastery of their environmental domain and assured freedom from encroachment, when economic necessity does not take priority, that they are in a position to devote part of their effort and resources for cultural, philosophical, intellectual or religious pursuits. It is during these periods that the great scientific and spiritual truths are envisioned; when the masterpieces are created and new religions take shape. And it is with these sporadic occurrences like the botanical sports (the pink flowering branch on the white flowered dogwood) that provided the means and impetus up the next step of human progress.

It is these facets of mental illness that should be thoroughly investigated by psychiatrists. The blackout, the amnesia, combined with the electric shock treatments, provided the surcease from the whole mess and the restoration of memory was piecemeal, giving me the time between doses to assimilate each one and to test out my new concept of God, step by step.

Incidentally, during this phase I derived tremendous satisfaction in pointing out to some of the psychiatrists who resorted to heckling that when God was ready for me to get out, I would get out, regardless. When my tutelage ended at the hospital God took me back into the old hell. It hadn't changed but I had. It took another three years and then I walked out, with the assurance that I now have.

While these personal details may be boring or unsavory to some, and resented by others, they are pertinent in the tackling of our obstacles.

1. That although a recovery from mental illness (Obst. 2) may be slow, there's no need to get discouraged if one uses the guide posts - "The Miracles of Coincidence, etc." of God's omnipresence and love.
2. The doom of annihilation would not now be hovering over our heads if even one-tenth of the people in our christian democracy really believed that God is running this world, and had the guts to act on their convictions. The doom may not be dispelled till in the future but the time to start dispelling it is now, as individuals. Once the individual is absolutely sure in his own mind that God, with his omniscience and omnipotence is completely capable, then all he has to do is to place himself in God's hands and he has security. This is implicit trust - the knowing that no matter what happens, God is letting it happen. It doesn't require any heroism to make a sacrifice when one knows that the cost will be worth the price.
3. The choice of death by annihilation or living in constant dread of that day confronts us with a situation analagous to mine. What the representatives of the white race need to recognize is, that as far as the progress of the human race is concerned, IT IS DISPENSIBLE, just as was sporadic types of civilization in the past. That God will not hesitate to sacrifice us, if in his judgment it is necessary to teach the rest of the human race the folly of the peoples who place their reliance on material things, and who will compromise with their consciences for the sake of expediency.
4. God has given us the knowledge of the good and bad uses of the atom and the divine heritage of freedom of choice. If the white race makes the unwise choice and for the sake of expediency resorts to destruction, it will destroy itself either by annihilation or sterility. War is hell and whatever the modernization it will still be hell.

Why has God allowed us to get into this mess, since with his omnipotence he could have prevented it?

1. Because of the threat of annihilation the human race has witnessed in ten years a technological achievement that would have otherwise taken a hundred years or more.
2. Because of the physical needs of the human race in its infancy food, clothing and shelter will now be made available for all with mass production, automation and atomic power.

This will provide the human race as it matures and begins to recognize its obligations with the necessities of time and the facilities for mental and spiritual pursuits. As each segment or group reaches this stage of economic security, the individuals through group participation and concerted action will be able to utilize their leisure for the pursuit of happiness as a group.

This requires however, that as individuals, each one has reached that stage of maturity in his own mental and spiritual development which recognizes the responsibility of shouldering his own obligations and the willingness to sacrifice, if need be, in the sharing of group pursuits. As history shows, insulated segments of humanity, when relieved of the pressures of physical survival, have provided us with our great masterpieces, musical compositions, philosophies, etc.

The problems that we are meeting today and which are the cause of our mental confusion are due to the facts:

1. That the world is in a transitional stage.
2. That the problems of youth as a race are analogous to the problems of youth as individuals.
3. When we trace the growth pattern of infancy, youth and maturity as evidenced, whether it be as individuals, family, nation, the white, yellow or black race, or in mankind as a whole, it becomes immediately apparent that the human race is in the youth stage.

God's reason for providing us with all these interlocking growth patterns and man's relatively short tenure of finite existence also becomes apparent. Every adult has experienced the difficult problems of immaturity in his youth and is thus enabled to recognize these same problems as encountered in the continuity growth patterns of nations and the human race.

God's operation of our atoms, together with his Gift, provides the ways and means for the relief which will enable all mankind the same opportunity of normal development of its mental and spiritual endowments that are typical of youth. With PEACE and with SHARITY the objective pursuit of happiness can be realized. When we examine the irrefutable evidence that God has used in his adaptation of the infinite to the finite, we can come to only one conclusion. There are no conflicts in the evidence - that all divisions of the human race have passed through the primitive or infancy stage and that now we are in the transitional period of youth, the age of rebellion, no longer completely dependent on others as in infancy and not yet ready to take the full responsibilities of maturity.

As was stated, God's gift provides us with the necessary information for charting our course up the path of enlightenment. We are confronted not only with the necessity of backtracking on our Super-Duper Highway, but also of salvaging as much as possible.

This operation, to be successful, requires the removal of obstacles, and God's gift provides the ways and means in our Co-operative Enterprise. At one and the same time we are confronted with the necessity of blazing new trails, heading in the direction of the goals that are in conformity with the aspirations and ideals of the human race as a whole.

In the blazing of these new trails we must of necessity share the responsibility of individual contribution of effort and viewpoint for the purpose of focalizing them on the common goal. We can no longer rely on the leadership of past generations.

The "Paths" to a peace without Duress and with dividends have never been explored by the human mind. Nor is it conceivably possible for any human being today to predict with certainty ALL crucial world events that may occur EVEN one week hence. Whether we as individuals or groups recognize God's omnipotence or not, our finite powers are insignificant in comparison with the infinite, and are impotent if God sees fit to withhold the opportunity.

This is God's way of holding control in His hands and at the same time affording us our divine heritage - "the freedom of choice".

I am in a position to make these statements unequivocally because I alone know the following facts.

1. God's gift is in a state of preparation.
2. The launching of the gift will be a crucial world event.
3. No human being can forsee the opportunities that God will provide nor predict the time that He chooses for the launching.

The job before us encompasses the whole world and all mankind. No finite brain can envisage this stupendous task, much less fulfill the obligations entailed in the performance that must be assumed if the achievements are commensurate with the responsibilities involved. With a setup of this kind the results are obvious. We have the job aspirants who are guilty of unwarranted presumption and a group of mentally irresponsible incompetents machinating them into the jobs. Please do not misunderstand me. I am not casting aspersions at our worthy representatives. I am not blaming our willing Georges. I AM pinpointing the blame on every American citizen who is passing the buck - every American who has demonstrated his capabilities as an operator of an automobile is also capable of acquiring the know-how that is necessary for the performance of his duties as a citizen.

Our progenitors presented us with a virile democratic form of government which has preserved for us our inalienable rights of liberty - "Freedom of Choice" and with a governmental framework "of the people, for the people and by the people" that would have enabled us with group participation, to exercise those rights, had we so chosen. Our forefathers sacrificed their lives and property to secure the opportunity of participating in the decisions that affected their welfare. They were mature mentally and spiritually as well as physically. God had given them brains which could be used as a thinking apparatus as well as a recording device for the sights, sounds, bumps, smells, tastes, and other sensations. These men and women had minds of their own and they used them in tackling ALL the problems economical, ethical and spiritual, that confronted them in their daily living as human beings. It is my conviction that these folk actually derived immense satisfaction in using their intellects, just as most of us when given the opportunity of job, experience satisfaction in the fruits of our labor. I may be wrong, of course, be that as it may, but the facts still remain.

1. They didn't hire somebody else to do their thinking for them (maybe some would have so chosen if they'd had the money).
2. But the majority unequivocally demonstrated with their willingness to sacrifice both their lives and material goods, the indomitable conviction of the worthwhileness of our God Given Heritage.

The cost of the sacrifice is worth the price. Two hundred years ago the yoke of a foreign, despotic paternalism - taxation without representation, was an intolerable affront to the mental caliber of those accustomed to using their own minds, whose intellects as well as bodies had progressed beyond the stage of infancy. Our founding forefathers envisioned a new socialogical order, "A CHRISTIAN DEMOCRACY" - A MECCA - A new world and way of living; a healthy atmosphere with the environmental opportunities essential for a thriving, mental and spiritual optimum of development.

Here we are today, two hundred years hence. Let's take a good look at ourselves. Is our government even a reasonable facsimile of that democracy? I say it isn't. It's a Frankenstein octopus. It's a Hired-archy and we the people are so rich that we not only can afford to pay our governmental functionaries to do the jobs we cannot do ourselves, but we also can afford to hire millions and millions of others to do the job of citizenship.

In the first role, which is concerned with the intimate relations of human behavior as exemplified in courtship, matrimony, and siring of offspring, man needs no help, wants no help, and the minimum requisites of human decency necessitate the respect and restraint for the other fellow in matters of privacy. This is where segregation fits into the framework. Rules of social propriety to be observed, must provide a healthy climate of understanding.

There is another aspect of our creation when we examine the framework and that is the paradoxical element of SIMILARITY; "The like and the unlike", that enables us, as human beings, 1. to group; 2. to classify.

Without the introduction of this factor our world of infinite variation and multiplicity of choice would be one of chaos. The ability to group and classify establishes the necessity of "Preservation of Groups" to our very existence. Incidentally, the necessity of group preservation debunks the Marxian theory of a classless society.

Our Creator, while giving us the Freedom of Choice, has also endowed us with the instinct of preference for one's own kind. If we, as finite beings, take the precautions that are within our finite domain and provide groups of sufficient numbers for the exercise of preference, then we will have eliminated many of the problems of adolescents and young adults. Instead of crucifying our children, the problems of segregation can only be solved with the maintenance of groups sufficiently large, of any minority to provide the opportunity to exercise a preference and to prevent the unhealthy reactions of constraint and frustration.

Perhaps an integrated segregation would describe what I have in mind as a solution for our school problems. If society puts these practices into execution, the dissolution of the fears of miscegenation should automatically result. Keeping the principle in mind that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure", in the incipient organization of our Peace Mobiles, will be a step in the right direction. The job aspirants will be happily adjusted married couples with proof of normal growth pattern and assumption of responsibility culminating in marriage and family.

Women will have equal representation, with equal opportunities, responsibilities, and salaries. As we shall see when we examine the evidence as presented in our growth patterns, there is another factor of profound significance.

In our world today, the female of the species just ain't what they useterbe, but if my limited observations of the white race prevail, a whole lot of the males seemingly are. The DISCREPANCY that exists today in the maturity growth rates of males and females is the CRUX of the socialogical upheaval we are witnessing today. It is this discrepancy that is responsible for the stresses and strains of matrimonial discord and broken homes. It is the DISPARITY in the emergence of masculine and feminine attributes as dominating factors in their respective roles characteristic of the infant, or primitive, and the youth stage, which now confront us. As we all know, the essentials of infancy are the material ones of food and shelter which were provided by the primitive father either with physical strength or prowess. The provider used man power and tools or weapons and violence to secure these needs, and as a result the masculine attribute of physical strength automatically gave the male the dominant role of ascendancy in the human race. With the introduction of machines and improved weapons, we begin to see the decline of male dominance and the emergence of the female attribute, stamina, slowly but increasingly asserting its role in counterpoise. The current definition of equality of sexes has no more validity than the generally accepted definition of equality as applied to human beings, races, etc.

We have already discussed that erroneous concept and suggested a new standard of evaluation. Both the dual and single standards are inconsistent with the facts and the attempts of arbitrary imposition are responsible for many of society's ills.

The ethical standards applicable to both males and females are those which recognize the entity of the individual - mentally, spiritually, and physically.

This is man's second role: The stretching out of his own two hands to clasp the hands of his neighbors, the doing through group participation the things he cannot do alone.

In this connection, the standards of evaluation are to be determined by the effective assumption of responsibility demonstrated by group participation in the economic, political, cultural, ethical and religious fields of opportunity that are available. AVAILABILITY is the yard stick. We simply cannot judge the conduct of any human being if opportunity is lacking.

With inferiority of achievement as a criterion, justice cannot prevail as long as there are closed doors. On the other hand, superiority of achievement in spite of these handicaps as manifested both in the inequities of divine dispensation and finite barriers that are in evidence throughout the world today, affords conclusive proof of the fallacy of a super race or sex.

Today, with our pushbutton economy, the male attribute of strength is downgraded and the female attribute of stamina is upgraded. The modern woman can get for herself what the man of the past gave her. Women have attained this position in spite of the handicaps. We have arrived - resistance of that portion of the male population whose normal growth patterns have been retarded by too much coddling can be taken care of by the female brand of firmness.

The attributes of stamina, persistence (the ability to carry on in spite of the odds), and ingenuity in the handling of the male during the nine months of pregnancy that have enabled women to survive despite exploitation, are all assets to be reckoned with.

Resorting only to violence when everything else fails, we will reward the gentlemen with thank you's and smiles if they hold the doors open for us. We are willing and capable of opening the doors ourselves. We are also capable of busting down those doors if the infantiles refuse to yield their Status Quo and use the closed doors as barricades.

Another factor has made its appearance on the scene, so upsetting in its influence that it is not an exaggeration to use the term revolutionary as descriptive of the behavior reactions of planned parenthood and birth control at the positive end of the scale with the negative, imponderable nullification of the old order of (cause and consequence) on the other. It is the simultaneous removal of the prospect of pregnancy which both restrained conduct and fixed responsibility, together with the rise of economic independence and moral apathy of social conscience that confronts mankind with an ominous situation never before paralleled.

The churches of today, firmly entrenched in the MISCONCEPTS of the race in its infancy, (1. the concept of God as an authoritarian judge to be placated with bloody sacrifices and intermediaries; 2. the miracles of coincidence involved in the conception of a human being are a dirty business), have marshalled their forces:

1. To combat the emergence of the evolutionary manifestations of love, with condemnation.

2. To thwart the inate demonstrations of that love with the substitution of paternalism for paternity - the requisite of infancy.

Not unless, and until, the human race learns to appreciate and utilize the divine blessings of conjugal love, parental and brotherly love, will we be able to weather this crucial period.

It is with the emphasis on the paternal love, now dormant, that contains the solution.

Christ, when He instructed us to pray to our heavenly Father, ascribed to our heavenly Father the attributes of an earthly father.

This relationship of mankind to our benevolent Creator has brought the concept within the comprehension of little children.

It is another example of the adaption of the infinite to the finite. It is in the provision for our concept of the Creator as a loving Father and in the continuity of Father-son relationship, with the son in turn becoming the father, that our whole existence derives its meaning.

This father-son relationship is given further dignity in the PARTICIPATION of the INDIVIDUAL in CREATION.
When God provided for 'Planned Parenthood' He literally took man and his mate into partnership -- power to plan and to participate in the creation of a human being.

Furthermore, in the God-given freedom to select the mate, which limits the genetic constitution of the individual, the parents in their partnership with God actually have a very significant part in determining the attributes of their offspring.

The fact that God has entrusted man with this vital participation in creation is again profound evidence of His faith in the inherent goodness in every individual.

Every debasement of sex, whether by word, thought, or deed, is a desecration of that trust.

Perhaps the miracles as related, and the dramatization of the story of Christ's conception and birth, are God's way of showing us that He could have chosen this method of creation for all of us.

It should be apparent to the most cynical observer that, as in the case of a world without variation, how utterly drab a world without conjugal love would be.

The course of Enlightenment is clearly marked.

The solemnity of the marriage vows and the sanctity of the home - the essentials of 'Planned PARENTHOOD' are the paramount issues.

Indulgence without regard for the provision and preservation of life itself should no more be condoned than armed robbery, to say the least.

Excessive birth-rate, divorce, juvenile delinquency, etc., are the evil off-shoots, but not the roots.

Our children should be impressed from infancy with the spiritual qualities of their origin and that the powers of creation are one and inseparable with the planned provision of the care of the child.

But in the intimacy of physical union, unless we share the mutual respect for the spiritual and mental attributes as well as the physical; unless we are dedicated in spirit to the cherishing of these qualities of the loved one as an individual, then we are not prepared for the act of participation in creation with God as a partner.

Conjugal love is a philtre - a device for enhancing the desirable.
It is a filter - a device for minimizing the shortcomings.

That this is a goal worth striving for few will deny. That it can be achieved only with God's help, is the unadulterated truth. The authenticity of the holy scriptures is not questioned, nor is the validity of vision or revelation. What concerns us are the contents that have been preserved in their present form in spite of the incalculable odds of their preservation. These holy scriptures have been a guide to mankind down through the ages of infancy, early childhood, and we are still trying to use them. In the presentation of the Ten Commandments, Moses has omitted any reference of automobiles, yet today life itself is dependent on observance of certain rules of conduct in regard to the automobile.

How would you have explained this to Moses? Again - How would you have presented the life of Jesus Christ in a way that it could be understood by the race in its early childhood and be just as serviceable in its application to modern complexity and reality? In the presentation that has been preserved, God has provided us with:

I. The Continuity Pattern - 'The Loving Heavenly Father' - The Earthly Son - The Loving Heavenly Father.

A. The Loving Heavenly Father was portrayed with the dramatization of incidents relative to the conception and birth of Jesus with the participants prepared with visions, etc. Today we do not require the super-natural as an explanation. Our knowledge of artificial insemination, test tube babies, genes and chromosomes adequately takes care of the Heavenly Father's capabilities and eliminates the services of an earthly Papa.

B. The Earthly Son - 'The Loving Heavenly Father'. Adequate provision of witnesses was assured with the publicity afforded by the dramatization of events leading up to the crucifixion and that transpired during the resurrection.

C. The portrayal of our Creator as a 'Loving Heavenly Father' who demonstrated his loving provision of a life everlasting to all humanity with the sacrifice of his dearly beloved Son Jesus. Our Creator provided us with the proof that death is but a transition with the mental and spiritual attributes of the individual retained in the life beyond. We had to have the testimony of witnesses of the death, the burial, and the resurrection. Christ's mission on earth was to provide the evidence.

D. That our tenure is restricted only to the finite limitations of existence in the physical attributes of the individual - with death affording the release from these imposed finite restrictions.

E. That the LIFE BEYOND affords unrestricted opportunity for the development of the mental and spiritual endowment. To Christ this mission was worth the cost of the sacrifice, and He was willing to pay the price.

If Christ had been an earthly father, the continuity pattern of Heavenly Father - Earthly Son - Heavenly Father would have been broken. Jesus was denied the ecstacies of conjugal love and the satisfactions of family life and children.

St. Luke 18: 15,16

And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them, but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them.

But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.

To Jesus, children meant heaven.

It was not the physical suffering, but the mental anguish - the loneliness and the longings. These were the things that Jesus gave up to provide us with the evidence of life everlasting. What is the verdict? Was the sacrifice made in vain?

So far our statistics of high divorce rate, broken homes, and unwanted children, prove that the cost of the sacrifice was not worth the price that Jesus paid - Obstacle 6. And the cost of that sacrifice will never be worth the price of renunciation, just as long as the human race fails to appreciate the blessings of its divine heritage. Jesus was sacrificed so that the rest of us would not make the unwise choice of yielding to the temptations of sexual indulgence, but make the wise one, by doing everything that we can to preserve the sanctity of the home as a fitting place for the rearing of our children. The "Doctrine of Appeasement" that portrays a Loving Heavenly Father that accepts the bloody sacrifice of his beloved Son as payment in full for the forgiveness of our debts of iniquity seems to me utterly incongruous with our concepts of a loving Earthly Father. If you had been caught stealing apples by the owner of an orchard and were promised forgiveness and release if you would drive nails in the hands of that man's little son, how would you feel?

Are these acts consistent with your concept of a Loving Father? Thus far we have been dealing with the evolutionary aspects of religion and their implications when applied to our concepts of love. (Incidentally, the Father-Mother-God-all harmonious concept that was introduced by Mary Baker Eddy is an evolutionary step forward in religion. The female, as well as the male, is created in God's image.) We can combat the forces of evil that are now undermining the very foundations of society by affording full opportunity for the exercise of the adult male's dormant instinct of Paternity. We must depend on the men who have weathered the temptations and shouldered their responsibilities of fatherhood but so far have lacked the opportunity of participation in family pursuits. We have noted that the women of today can do the things that the men did for them in the past. With the exception of breast feeding, a man can perform every task in his home, and for his children, that a woman can and, with the wife as co-provider, he will have the time and obligation to do so.

With the upgrading of paternity and the down grading of maternity, the modern dramas of life will depict the father performing the duties of distaff. In this critical period of re-adjustment with the shifting of responsibility it will be up to the males:

1. To keep the home fires burning.
2. To fend off the lures of the roving Romeos who invade his household.
3. To compensate with his own admiration, appreciation and understanding love, for the less lucrative and glamorous but wise choice of job by his wife that would disrupt his home. He knows the temptations that will beset his wife. He cannot combat them with jealousy and mistrust. As confident, with gentleness, and as councilor and co-partner he can surmount them.

With the exodus of women from the home into industrial and professional fields, a vacuum has been created which can only be filled by the men. What we have been witnessing is an imbalance of function. Juvenile delinquency is only one of the aspects. It is sensational because the victims, in general, eloquently demonstrate that all is not right with their world.

These kids have used their safety valves and let off their steam. They have sowed their wild oats. It is the ones that don't that we should really worry about - the mentally unstable - the kids who have donned the cloaks of respectability, who give lip service to the synthetic sentimentalism of Mother's Day, etc.; that has replaced the outmoded concept of paternal authority.

The disquieting events that we have been witnessing make it obvious that this synthetic sentimentalism is no substitute for parental love, an interest in the child, which would give security. The ways and means must be provided for through the coordination of industry, the school and the parents to enable the family to act as a unit.

1. This means the shifting of working hours to allow for parental supervision.
2. Day nurseries for the pre-school child.
3. Active participation of both of the parents in the school regime.
   (a) This will involve a disruption of the present school system, which is even now understaffed, but with parental participation both the understaffing and the extra load will be remedied simultaneously with the innovations of
      (1) behavior study of the individual child at the earliest possible moment;
      (2) the acquisition of the universal language;
      (3) the utilization of the unique qualities of the postage stamp as an educational device.

Many of the teachers today, because of their unfamiliarity of the hobby, will undoubtedly be at the same disadvantage that the New York teachers experienced with the introduction of Nature Study in the school curriculum.

This active participation of both parents - the assumption of responsibility - in the child's school life, will provide the now absent feeling of belonging and of being loved, which gives security.

In this transitional period, this means the maturity of responsibility for both. A totally new approach to the business of courtship as well as matrimony must be devised, that will provide environmental opportunities and climate for love to thrive and eliminate the frustrations and feelings of guilt. God operates our atoms. The biochemical chain of reactions, in the uninhibited form of lust, are in the same category as excessive appetite for food and alcoholism.

As with alcoholism, human volition is not sufficient. We need God's help. Instead of temptations for evil, we've got to glamorize our good assets. Instead of the male predilection for cheesecake, which is restricted to physical attraction only, he will have to cultivate a taste for marble cake with streaks of both angel and devil, that are evinced in the mental and spiritual attributes of the female as an individual.

We want happiness, and we can rest assured that our Loving Heavenly Father has provided in our divine heritage the ways and means of achieving that happiness, once we learn to use our God-given assets properly. God's kingdom on earth can be a paradise, but it won't be any Garden of Eden, with only one temptation and nothing to do but run around naked and converse with a snake. Some males like Italian spaghetti and others prefer Irish stew. It is reasonable to assume that along with our instinct of preference in the selection of one's mate, God has provided the gals to suit all tastes and vice versa. This would be holy wedlock, when accompanied with the rituals of the Holy Sacrament with the marriage license an accessory to take care of inheritance, etc. As of now we do not have the facts that will provide the conclusive proof of this assumption. The job before us is to get them. When we once begin to collect the data I can assure you that the collection will make the evolutionary data be a mole hill in comparison.

Obstacle 6, page 22. The broken homes and the high divorce rate.

The Kinsey investigations are a good start, and my own investigations have been interrupted because of the launching of our Enterprise PEACE, and also I have been handicapped in the pursuit by the devastatingly turbulent reactions of the E.R.Q.'s whenever I endeavored to sound off.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

A motion picture of rare entertainment and emotional power is "Conspiracy of Hearts," which Paramount Pictures--with great pride--will release in April.

A suspense-filled World War II story of a group of Catholic nuns in Italy and their efforts to smuggle Jewish refugee children out of a Nazi prison camp is a film you will long remember.

It stars Lilli Palmer as Mother Katharine, Sylvia Syms as Sister Mitya and Yvonne Mitchell as Sister Gerta. Such internationally prominent players as Ronald Lewis, Albert Lieven, Peter Arne, Nora Swinburne and George Coulouris are featured in the supporting cast of the Rank Organization presentation, directed by Ralph Thomas.

"Conspiracy of Hearts" illustrates a simple and fundamental truth: that the communion of hearts can overwhelm the powers of evil. In these uncertain times the film's powerful message of love, faith and courage cannot be too strongly stated and re-stated.

I am pleased to offer you and your guests an opportunity to share the rich rewards of "Conspiracy of Hearts" at a private afternoon or evening showing, at your convenience, during the next two weeks. I will be delighted to make available the Paramount Prevue Theatre (seating capacity is 50) located on the ninth floor of the Paramount Building, 1501 Broadway, for this purpose.

I would appreciate your advising if and when this special preview can be arranged.

With best wishes.

Cordially,

Dear Mr. Moore:

I am sorry to tell you that Mr. Murrow is not in New York, having already departed for the West Coast where the first of the political conventions will take place in July. He will unfortunately not be able to make the recording for you. I hope you will be able to find someone else and that the play will be a success.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Olney Theatre, located just outside Washington, D.C., is planning a production of Thornton Wilder's great American classic, THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH, for two weeks in July.

We would like to make a request for a favor that would be a great boost to our production and, we hope, fun for you. The play opens with projected slides on a screen and a newscaster's voice describing the crisis in the world with a glacier moving down the North American continent. The sequence has a great deal of wit and fun in it.

We would like to give the play immediacy and a genuine contemporary feeling by making the voice over the speaker a popular, well-known personality such as yourself.

Would you be willing to record on tape for us this short (3 or 4 mins.) passage? Naturally, it would be fully credited and publicized by us.

May we please have an early (and favorable) reply?

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On Sunday, October 9th, an outstanding golf event will take place at the Vernon Hills Country Club, Tuckahoe. The occasion will be THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT, Pro-Celebrity Amateur Golf Tournament for personalities of radio, television, stage, screen and sports, golf professionals and select amateurs. The enclosed item by Guido Cribari, country sports editor of the Macy-Westchester newspaper chain, will give you some additional background on this forthcoming event and the work of THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT.

Proceeds will be used by the FIGHT FOR SIGHT to aid its vital work of supporting eye research to discover the causes and cures of the tragic diseases of the eye which now bring partial and total blindness to so many.

Knowing of your interest in golf, the committee has asked that we invite you to participate in one of the foursomes, along with an outstanding golf pro and two amateurs golfers, and to ask you to join the participants as a guest of Vernon Hills Country Club and THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT at a post-tournament dinner following the event.

Perry Como, Jan Murray, and Sammy Kaye are among those who have already been enlisted and Bernard Grey and the members of the Vernon Hills Country Club have been exerting every effort to make this tournament a memorable day in golf. Committees responsible for publicity, tickets sales throughout Westchester County, and other details have been organized, and, from every indication, should be a very exciting occasion.

We look forward to your acceptance of this invitation and to your participation as the celebrity member of one of the foursomes. Please return the enclosed card at your earliest convenience.

CRIBARI Says:

Mildred Weisenfeld's Big 'Fight For Sight'

Comedian Bob Hope gets tons of mail a year. But the lovable California clown prizes most a letter he received the other day during a brief visit to New York City.

Hope was so thrilled by the letter, he made it a point to read it to his luncheon guests Friday afternoon. One of the guests was Fred Corcoran of Scarsdale, who will assist Hope with the filming of the proposed television golf show featuring the distaff members of the PGA this fall.

"I've never seen a guy so thrilled over a piece of mail," Corcoran reported. "You'd think he had just received a million dollar contract."

The letter was from Mildred Weisenfeld of New York. And anyone who hasn't met Mildred Weisenfeld, has been denied the privilege of meeting one of the truly fine woman of our times.

Mildred is blind. She lost her sight completely at the age of fifteen as the result of measles during childhood.

This wonderful woman accepted the setback courageously, but with a determination that startled her family and friends.

In Aug. of '46, she founded Fight For Sight, an organization dedicated to financing research for the restoration and preservation of sight.

Mildred had only an idea. There was no money, no office or paid workers, nothing but dedication and determination.

Just to give you an idea of the energy and drive of this dynamic woman, last year along Fight For Sight raised over $300,000. The organization has awarded a half million dollars in research grants. There are eye research centers in 26 states and a number of foreign countries. Fight For Sight's scientific advisory committee includes many of the world's foremost eye specialists.

Back in March, two Arthur Murray television shows were devoted to Fight For Sight using Bob Hope's name for its magnetic value. More than $100,000 was realized through the two TV ventures. Fight For Sight received more than 40,000 pieces of mail, more than half from persons afflicted with eye ailments pleading for help.

Thus, Mildred's letter of thanks to Bob Hope.

"This is the nicest thing I've ever received," Hope told Corcoran the other day. "She's the most amazing woman I've ever met. We must do something for her and the Fight For Sight."

Mildred did not know of Hope's reaction to her letter. We told her last Friday night during a special dinner meeting at Vernon Hills Country Club. She was on the verge of tears.

"Really, did he say that? Did he really?" she asked. "He's the most wonderful person I've ever met, too."

This coming Oct. 9, a pro-celebrity golf tournament will be staged at Vernon Hills Country Club, with all receipts earmarked for Fight For Sight. They've set a goal of $10,000. Last year the inaugural fund-raising event for Fight For Sight was held at the Briar Hall Club. The good folks of Briar Hall and a few wriends throughout the County assisted this promotion to the tune of $7,500.

"There's so much more to be done," Mildred said yesterday. "We must keep working. Thousands are losing their sight daily. Eye research can mean light instead of darkness for unnumbered thousands. Won't you help?"

Won't you?

A Child Pleads..

. . . and you can help . . . you can answer this plea! On the cover is a photograph of a youngster stricken with a blinding eye disease . . . he is waging a grim, hard fight to conquer a tragic affliction that is threatening to take from him the precious gift of sight . . . to doom him to a lifetime of eternal darkness . . . never again to see the faces of loved ones, the childhood treasures that have meant so much to him . . . never again to romp free and unaided with his playmates.

How do you tell this to a youngster?

How do you explain the heart-rending fact that there is no way to stop the curtain of darkness from descending? That science does not have the answer that can restore brightness and light to his young world?

This could happen to the little boy next door . . . the little girl up the street . . . a mother, a father, a friend . . . it could happen to you . . . for blinding eye diseases now take the sight of another man, woman or child in our nation every 20 minutes — 3 every hour!

You can help find the answers that will conquer these diseases and prevent the tragedy of blindness.

Defective Sight and Blindness . . . A Major Health Problem In Our Nation Today

- 70,000,000 people have faulty vision in the United States.
- 9,000,000 school children require care for eye defects.
- 1,300,000 persons have lost the sight of one eye.
- 334,000 Americans are blind.
- 1 out of every 50 persons age 40 and over has glaucoma, a dread disease of the eye which can lead to blindness.
- Nearly 60% of the people aged 60 suffer from cataracts. This figure approaches 100% for persons 80 years of age.

As science lengthens our life span more of our people live in semi or total darkness.

$150,000,000 is spent in our nation each year to aid the blind — but only about 3% of this amount is spent on research that can prevent this tragedy.

There is a way to erase these statistics . . . through your support of eye research . . . through your contribution to THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT.

DOLLARS HOLD THE KEY TO RESEARCH that can and must open the door to sight for millions all over the world.

Only a few years ago, a dread eye disease which baffled science took the sight of thousands of babies born prematurely. Research succeeded in almost completely removing this scourge from our midst.

And this is but one of the many accomplishments made possible in recent years through increased support to research.

At least seven out of every ten people who might otherwise lose their sight can be saved through research and treatment.

. . . That is the dedicated purpose of THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT . . . to support research that will find the causes, beneficial treatments and cures for blinding eye diseases and defective vision.

. . . And YOU can help provide the funds that eye research so desperately needs to make it possible for this objective to be realized.

THE FIGHT FOR SIGHT

is the descriptive slogan of the National Council to Combat Blindness, Inc., founded in 1946 to advance and support research for the restoration and preservation of sight.

It has to date awarded more than 300 research grants and fellowships to qualified investigators, hospitals, medical colleges, eye centers and other institutions in 23 states and 7 foreign countries.

Through these awards researchers are investigating glaucoma . . . blindness due to diabetes . . . eye tumors . . . cataracts . . . deterioration of the eye with advancing age . . . diseases of the retina . . . and the many other eye problems affecting children and adults.

In addition, the FIGHT FOR SIGHT has assisted in the establishment of an eye clinic in a community where such care has heretofore been unavailable. It has provided equipment to set up a glaucoma detection service — sponsored a clinic to investigate the use of special visual aids for individuals with seriously impaired sight—and made a number of special grants which, in the opinion of its Scientific Advisory Committee, will aid in the ultimate reduction of blindness.

The FIGHT FOR SIGHT is not one of the organizations which provide books in braille, white canes and other rehabilitation services for those who are already blind—it is a voluntary health agency with the primary purpose of stimulating and supporting research which can prevent this tragedy.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

We are shortly embarking on a series of articles on "American Attitudes" and I wondered whether you would like to help us with a contribution?

As this is election year in the U.S.A. there is more than the usual interest in Britain in everything American. America has become the leader of the free world but the pictures presented of her through films, books and so on is of a nation that is oddly wild and irresponsible. We want to show our readers why such an illusion should have grown up, and how much there is in it. Is there really all this corruption in American Government, local and central? In the law and the police? Is the day of the gangster ended? Is juvenile delinquency as bad as they say? How does the electoral system work? What are the proportions of work, necking, sport and graft in the American Universities? What we want is an authoritative view on questions of this kind, personal, obviously to the writer, and planned in such a way that the reader gets:

a) A review of popular conceptions and misconceptions.

b) Corrective or confirmative information, figures and ideas.

c) A sort of summing up.

I wondered if you would be prepared to do a piece on the apparent weakness of the Americans for such manifestations of mass hysteria as McCarthyism, the Klu Klux Klan, Aimee Semple McPherson. Do this things really get a grip on the public, and have they any great influence in public life? Treatment: as light as possible. Length: 1800 - 2000 words. Fee: 50 guineas.

I would be glad if you would let me know whether or not you can do this for me.

Yours sincerely,

Bernard Hollowood,
Editor.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Policies, on an international level, are constantly being praised and attacked by editors, academicians, scientists, students and the average American. Opinions develop according to the orientation of the individual towards the issue; what to some is morally unbalanced, to others is politically sound. The diversification of attitudes towards international policies has prompted us to use the theme, "Morality versus Power Politics; America and the World", for the Queens College Spring 1960 International Day program.

International Day wasinstituted on the Queens College campus two years ago to empitomize long-standing and intense concern of Queens College students for world problems. At that time Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who had just returned from her trip to Russia, spoke on "The Challenge of the U.S.S.R".

Respecting your position as a reporter, journalist, and commentator, we, the International Day committee, ask you to address the Queens College campus. This year the program will take place on May 11th at 7:00 P.M. and will include an International Food Fest, a folk and square dance, and a speech-discussion period. We would expect the speech to cover a period of approximately forty-five minutes.

We hope that your many commitments will not prevent you from contributing your insights to the cultural and educational development of Queens College students.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Perhaps you are familiar with the Heart Open to the World Organization formed by Father Pire, 1958 Nobel Peace Prize Winner, in Huy, Belgium. A simple theme of the organization might be "to promote, by action, the spirit of brotherhood among men, people and races". A more detailed outline is set forth in the enclosed literature.

With respect to the Mahatma Gandhi International Youth Center Sessions which bring together young people ages 18 to 25 from all nations , the Junior Chamber of Commerce expects to conduct a Heart Open to the World Essay Contest to select two representatives from the United States. The initial 3 week session took place this month and the United States was not represented. We hope to remedy this in 1961.

The contest will be circulated through universities all over the country and will be judged on the basis of interest and understanding of the problems of world peace. The two young people to be selected will be sent to Huy, Belgium, expense free, to meet, work and study with similiar folks from all over the world.

We would be honored if you will serve on the Board of Judges for this worthwhile project. Rather than overburden your time, we will gladly submit a limited number of finalists papers to your attention, after the main body of applicants have been screened.

Thank you for your consideration.

Yours sincerely,

FROM HEART TO HEART

QUARTERLY NEWS BULLETIN Nr. 3 ● JULY 1960

News of «The World of the Heart».

Our crusade for a "World of the Heart" comprises, as you already know, six concrete points of action. No doubt you will be glad to have some news about three of them.

1. - Dialogue between adults and youth:

"The Mahatma Gandhi International Youth Centre".

Construction is now under way at Tihange-lez-Huy. The architects MM. Jean Godart and André Dombar, and the contractor M. Heine, are wholeheartedly devoting all their talent, to the construction of a model Centre.

The Centre's first session will be held from 7th to 28th of August. Enrolments represent Africa, the Arab World and different European countries (especially Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Great Britain, Ireland). The 1960 session will be divided in two parts. The first part will be confined to three types of manual work: construction (of the Centre itself under the contractor's direction), completion of the gardens, and domestic duties. The second part will be consecrated to the formation and to sports. Every day a personality will be available to initiate the youth to world problems. The youth need have no fear of what they themselves call "adult bla-bla". Those at their disposal will be genuine human beings, such as Dr. Hemerijckx, looking after the leprous of India; Mr. Ramachandra, a friend of Gandhi; Mr. Lanza del Vasto; the camp chief (a black from Ruanda) and many others.

We are aware that today's youths are at once generous and demanding. We wish to respond to their exigence and offer them the possibility of working precisely and efficaciously for world peace, which undoubtedly ought to be one of their most ardent desires.

If the program of the "Gandhi Centre" appeals to you, you can:

a) enrol, by giving the following particulars: Christian and surname — address — date and place of birth — nationality — occupation — standard of education — knowledge of languages. Also state the reasons which prompted your application, and enclose 3 references and a photo;

b) try to interest your friends actively, either in financing the construction, or in its furnishing and completion (a list of requirements can be sent you on demand).

c) send us your ideas and suggestions, so that our response to youth will be made adequate.

2. - Dialogue between Blacks and Whites.

In America as well as in Africa there has been, and still is, far too much division between Blacks and Whites . Too much racial prejudices, and segregation. Our duty is to fill in the trenches, caused by these prejudices. As you know, we therefore begin a system of friendly exchanges between Blacks and Whites. Sincere friends, who are acquainted with the African problems have helped us to establish a kind of "catechism" for white correspondents. Here it is:

1. A great number of the Black have been kept in a state of colonial dependence. They see now the possibility to be free, and they expect that we treat them simply the way we treat each other (therefore neither pity nor superior attitude or excessive interest).

2. The colonised black people tend to see only the drawbacks of civilisation.

3. Therefore one must place oneself above colonialism and anti-colonialism.

4. At any rate, we do not start talking about politics and wait for them to approach the subject.

5) If the Blacks write at length about it, one can —without making politics—reply to them that the fate of their countries lies now in their hands.

6. In replying, avoid over-commenting the danger of colonialism in order not to give the impression "to be the stranger who interfers with their business".

Father Pire presents his god-child Anne (Javanaise) to Joséphine Baker.

7. Conclusion as to politics: let them come, let them speak. Give a simple, sain, true and stable reply.

8. Try to establish as simple and natural from "Man-to-Man" dialogue as possible. Thus only very superficial errors can be made.

9. Note that the Blacks are very eager to learn. They should be helped in this respect (concrete advice, sending of books and magazines and, if at all possible, a small radio with battery, etc...)

10. Don't lose patience and do not expect an answer by return of mail.

11. Apart from his mother-tongue the Black in Africa knows French or English (depending on the colonial power of the region).

12. Sources of correspondents:

Colleges, universities (the university of Lovanium at Leopoldville runs a magazine entitled "Présence Universitaire").

Trade Unions, family movements.

If you are interested in these friendly exchanges between Blacks and Whites, you can:

1. Supply names and addresses of your relations in Africa and America, who will find black correspondents for us.

2. Occupy yourselves with these exchanges and win us also the support of your friends.

For your information, the following is a letter sent to the South African Government:

Gentlemen,

The attempt to assassinate the Chief of your Government is reproved by my conscience as well as by innumerable friends, and we sincerely wish that Mr. Verwoerd will promptly recover.

But as Nobel Peace Prize, I am acting also as spokesman of innumerable consciences which reprove the politic which you follow in your relations with your coloured brothers. The use of complicated certificates by which their lives are poisoned and imprisoned, the politic of separation of colours, the relegation of our black brothers in certain reserved areas and, above all, the use of violence shocks the human conscience. It is in the name of this conscience that I am addressing to you this appeal. I do not insist on the fact that your attitude attempts to remount the course of history which, inevitably, will have to be followed anyway. Human aspiration, backed up by legality and by the strength of number will be victorious. Unawareness of this is already bad calculation. Becoming aware of it too late means the unnecessary suscitation of hatred which afterwards can never be overcome.

Do not reply that this is none of my business and that this is just a matter of Internal Affairs. I am not a politician, and I do not want to be one. I am neither representing a block, nor a country, nor a religious or political group. I am a human being and am, as such, interested in mankind all over the world and, as such, have the right to look after my brothers.

Terror entails anti-terror, said my great friend, Dr. Schweitzer, to me. This proves to be true in Africa and elsewhere, and has already been proved many times in history.

Start a loyal war against the Black in your country; tank against tank, rifle against rifle, sword against sword, sling against sling. A war of chivalry. But stop the attacks in which you are temporarily stronger. I am asking you for this in your name, in your interest. I am asking you for this in the name of your black brothers. I am asking you for this in the name of the whole world and in the name of countless persons who are tired of seeing how the force carries away the right and how subsequently hatred carries away love.

May all discrimination in Africa and elsewhere against our black brothers finally be discontinued. History gives to those who do not understand another short respite. Beware of this, Gentlemen. At the present time a universal conscience is being borne. Injustice, wherever and against whomsoever practised, presents a problem in which mankind, as a whole, takes interest. In the name of mankind and of millions of people of good-will, I am asking you to search peaceful and just means in order to settle the problems, opposing Black and White in your country. If you do it, you will set an example for the whole world. If you do it, let me thank you in advance in the name of the whole world, let me congratulate you and let me offer to you my sincere good will.

3. - Dialogue above the Iron Curtain :

This is one of the sweetest dreams of peace. A difficult and important task, based on the conviction of the friendship of the human family, a conviction reinforced by the experience of each day.

Was it not moving to read the following, in a letter from a friend:

Six Nobel Peace Prize winners pose together for first time at Conference on World Tensions, meeting at the University of Chicago. They are (l. to r. seated) Lord John Boyd-Orr, Scotland; Lester B. Pearson, Canada; Sir Norman Angell, England; (standing) Philip Noel-Baker, England; the Rev. Dominique Pire, Belgium, and Ralph J. Bunche, United States.

"May I ask you to tell Father Pire that Pasternak, before dying, asked Mrs J. F. to convey to Father Pire how much his action interested him, and how much he agreed with him."

Very recently six Nobel Peace Laureates (Dr. A. Schweitzer being unable because of his age, to come from Africa) met at Chicago, for a congress, attended by 150 personalities, to study the problem of "Reduction of World Tensions".

The Nobel Peace Laureates present were:

Sir Norman Angell	Nobel Peace Prize 1933
Lord John Boyd-Orr	Nobel Peace Prize 1949
Sir Ralph J. Bunche	Nobel Peace Prize 1950
Sir Lester B. Pearson	Nobel Peace Prize 1957
Rev. Fr. Dominique Pire	Nobel Peace Prize 1958
Sir Noel Baker	Nobel Peace Prize 1959

In the course of the Congress each laureate made a declaration. The following is the entire text of Fr. Pire's declaration; a declaration more or less consecrated to the general conditions of all fraternal dialogue between men, and closing with two concrete propositions, the most important of which concerns precisely the "Dialogue above the Iron Curtain" :

> "The world in which I live fills me with aversion, but I find myself bound on all sides by Men who suffer there."
> (Albert Camus, Nobel Literature Prize.)

> "To love is not to look at one another but to look at the whole in the same direction."
> (Saint Exupéry.)

Those who participate or are interested in a congress set up to study the "Reduction of World Tensions" can be divided into optimists and pessimists. This depends whether they are more conscious of the wonderful possibilities, or the big obstacles found in Man. The words of Camus, cited above, show a balanced notion of these possibilities and obstacles. Side by side with its horrors, every epoch has its glories. Like Gandhi who lived and died, in order that men, and particularly Hindus and Moslems might live as Brothers. Speaking of the messsage of Asia, Gandhi said to his fellow-Indians: "If you wish to give a message to the West, it must be one of love and truth. I do not want to speak to your heads only. I want to win your hearts".

Such are also my sentiments at the beginning of this Chicago Conference.

My declaration today bears further on certain preliminary remarks, without which this conference is doomed to failure. These preliminary remarks concern the five following points:

1. The notion of peace.
2. The need of a common language.
3. The need of a common attitude.
4. The need of common work.
5. The presence of Nobel Peace Prize winners.

Perhaps I am going to appear to you as "l'enfant terrible", as "black sheep" of this conference. But a proverb says: "From the mouth of infants, truth comes". Here therefore are some notes, which I submit to your consideration:

I. — THE NOTION OF PEACE.

There are two notions of peace:

1° That which is founded on what Leibnitz called "unity of conspiracy, realising a real harmony and unity among men who aspire to the same end, with the same means".

2° That which is founded on the co-existence of human groups following the same end—justice and happiness—by different means.

The only possible peace between men seems to be that founded on peaceful co-existence. But I wish to emphasise the enormous confidence in Man, which is included in this affirmation. In fact, I dare to believe that men could get along well by mutually admitting their contradictions.

II. — COMMON LANGUAGE.

To realise peace, we must invite the whole world to an effort for unity. I think this effort must bear on language, attitude, and action.

The first preamble for all true dialogue between men, and consequently for the reducing of tensions between them, ought to be the suppression of the "dialogues of the deaf". Very often in fact, the majority of misunderstandings (general or particular) spring from a "dialogue of the deaf". Without a common point of departure, no dialogue is possible. The word liberty would no doubt furnish the best illustration of the Tower of Babel and the confusion of languages. If the "dialogue of the deaf" is maintained, it will render useless all efforts to reduce tension in the world. So that, before every conference aiming to reduce these tensions, a previous conference ought to be held, the subject of which would be: "Can men have common concepts, or a common language", or "The suppression of the dialogues of the deaf in the world". There would be three problems to be examined: the fight against all kinds of lies; the fight against pharisaism; the suppression of different meanings given to the same words (or at least the acceptance by all of these different meanings).

Finally, it must be added here that words (even with a common language) do not mean much. Only true gestures are eloquent. Their eloquence is truly international. It has no frontier.

III. — NECESSITY OF A COMMON ATTITUDE.

Common language is only the point of departure for a fraternal life. There must also be agreement on some basic principles considered as intangible. These can be summarised by three: reciprocal sincerity, mutual confidence, absence of egoism.

1. Reciprocal Sincerity.

Reference has already been made to this à propos of common language. In fact, all kinds of lies and pharisaism are opposed to sincerity. The French philosopher Jean Lacroix defined falsehood as the refusal of real relations. "There is falsehood", he wrote to me, "whereever there is insincerity, simulation, double-dealing, and especially indifference". Without reciprocal sincerity which, to my mind, is wanting in the two blocks which divide the world, every effort for peace would be vain.

2. Mutual Confidence.

Side by side with lies, suspicion is opposed to the fraternal dialogue between men. Suspicion only widens the division between the two blocks and consequently between the individuals of these blocks. On this subject I have had a very important interview with Doctor Albert Schweitzer. Everyone knows how much he has made himself, and continues to be the champion in the struggle, for the stoppage of all nuclear tests, even peaceful. Therefore it would seem evident, that the Doctor considers this stoppage as the essential, in striving for peace among all peoples. Nevertheless, the most eminent of Nobel Peace Prize winners knows, as a believer and an humanist, that firstly, neither money nor the bomb divides men. Rather it is the judgment they bear one towards the other and the egoism which characterises their relations. I think therefore that after two days' conversation with Dr. Schweitzer, I can tell you that for him the first task of peace is to fight whole-heartedly against prejudices, whether they arise between countries or individuals. For him the first contribution to world peace ought to consist in struggling against the systematic and à priori suspicion existing between the two blocks dividing the world. Systematic suspicion can only engender in its turn systematic suspicion. Undoubtedly one would find there the most certain explanation of the existence of an "iron curtain", which is partly a curtain of smoke, a curtain of misunderstanding. In order not to take the struggle against suspicion as something naive, would not this formula be a good one : "the open heart and the open eye"? Open heart, closed eyes = simplicity. Closed heart, open eye = suspicion. Open heart, open eye = prudence and goodness. Certainly the tension in the world will not diminish, by believing à priori that everything coming from the other block proceeds from an unhealthy intention and from machiavellian projects.

3. Absence of Egoism.

Since à priori suspicion and blind confidence are excluded, we are forced to replace them by a positive element. And this is the moment to affirm, to shout the primordial importance of goodness, of the gratuitous gesture. An eminent confrere, Fr. Sertillanges once said: "The egoist makes a bad reckoning". According to that there are many bad reckonings in the world. The aid to the under-developed countries, is perhaps the best illustration of it. Nobody doubts that that which pushes the great powers to interest themselves in the under-developed countries, is the egoistic interest of each block.

A whole seminar, entirely consecrated to remind that the gratuitous gift is proper to goodness, without subtle reckoning of the profit, would hardly be sufficient. The peacefully explosive nature of a gesture of true goodness is recognised by all humanists and all founders of religions. It is in this direction only that the way of peace is found.

Also, one must carefully meditate on what Jean Lacroix wrote to me:

"I say that for me the challange (following the language of Toynbe) to our civilisation (and this "our" embraces communism and capitalism) is that of the people called under-developed. Our civilisation (in the ensemble) either resolves this problem or perishes. If it resolves it, it will be transformed by that very effort itself. If it does not resolve it, it will disappear and will be replaced by another issue; the struggle itself of these under-developed people. And to me, that seems to surpass very much the East-West conflict. Personally, I know but one man, who has seen this exactly and has stated it clearly: he is François Perroux. And in my opinion, it is his triple slogan that must be realised:

1. Feed men;

2. Heal men;

3. Free the slaves.

Is it not in place to recall the wonderful words of Saint Exupéry: "To love is not to look at one another but to look at the whole in the same direction".

IV. — NEED FOR COMMON WORK.

I have just indicated the field of action in which peace-workers must meet. But a common task is not sufficient to unite men. To be really common and consequently unifying, the work ought to group all the partners. Let us take the case of our conference. If it desires to bring about the reduction of tension in the world, obviously it must number among its active participants, and that in a considerably equal number, representatives of all blocks, camps, peoples, and philosophies which divide the world. How can one study and reduce the tension if only one partner is present? On 11th December 1959 I pointed this fact out to the President of this conference. From documents which were sent to me on 17th March, I was surprised to find the following figures:

United States of America: 48 personalities or interventions.

Ecuador : 1.

Great Britain : 3.

Phillipines : 1.

Russia : 0.

China of Mao : 0.

South-East Asia : 0.

Arab World : 0.

Now, where are the problems? Between whom does the world tension exist? Therefore, there is the danger of seeing a conference, full of good will, attain a negative result. Time and energy wasted. And in order that our conference may not sink into inutility by hearing the voice of only one block, the "black sheep" has decided, in all humility and tenacity to lend his voice to the absentees: to the Russians, to the Chinese of Mao, to the inhabitants of South-East Asia, to the Africans and to the Arabs. I therefore bind myself in conscience and publicly, to sign no declaration, to accept no decision to give no support—not even indirect—(by tacit presence for example) to any motion which the conscience of the absentees would not accept. In that way I take on a great responsibility. But I know already, that so many brothers from the entire world will be present invisibly to support me. I do this because my human conscience forces me to the integral respect for all my brothers. I do it also, because the Nobel Peace Prize gives a very determined responsibility. Here is the place to say something of that responsibility.

V. — THE PRESENCE AND ROLE OF NOBEL PEACE PRIZE WINNERS.

Whether one likes it or not, the Nobel Peace Prize is a responsibility not a sanction nor a reward. And this is a great responsibility, despite the whims of those who write : "All the Nobel Peace Prizes have never prevented a war". Nobel himself continuously was preoccupied with problems of conscience, arising not only from the unfortunate sequels of the explosive discovered by him, but also and especially from the difficulty of establishing a fraternal world. Certainly the goal of his Prize was to reward "him who worked most or best for peace". But, de facto, at present the Nobel Peace Prize holders, thanks no doubt to the high moral value of their predecessors, represent in some way the conscience of the world. Actually, the Nobel Peace Prize is a moral credit at the service of all humanity, East and West. left and right. Now, all the Nobel Peace Prize winners—except my brother Dr. Albert Schweitzer, excused because of age and fatigue—find themselves gathered here. By their quasi-unanimous presence therefore, they seem to give a supplementary caution to this conference, the participants of which, one can say, represent almost exclusively the Western block. Personally, when leaving this conference, I wish to escape all classifications. I desire to remain an instrument of peace, at the service of all men.

Although the youngest Nobel Peace Prize holder, I dare to ask two things of my colleagues: the first: to declare loudly and publicly, as I myself do at this moment, that they are all willing to come together on the invitation of every other important block, other than the Western one (Asiatic, Communist, Arabian, African, etc.) of all camps, of all important human reunions which have in common either the same philosophy or the same religion.

Since they can and wish to serve the cause of peace, and since they are respected by the entire world (I have proof of that), I make to them a second proposal:

At the end of this year, perhaps in that Norway where they received their prizes, I invite them to a round-table conference, exclusively with the holders of the Lenin Peace Prize. Their influence and genius would thus be placed at the service of world problem number 1: the breaking of bread between all men.

If they agree to my two requests, their collective presence here will not only escape the danger of annexation by which they are threatened, but it will also show to the entire world that they are servants of peace.

Gandhi said: "I shall have no pleasure from living in this world if it is not united". And the philosopher Emmanuel Mounier wrote: "I think, that the duty of the spiritual man is to struggle against all closed societies".

For my part, with Gandhi, Albert Schweitzer and so many others, I believe in the unity of the human family, which is composed only of sons of God. It is this entire family, I wish to serve.

If this declaration interests you:

a) have it read by others;

b) be everywhere apostles of the war against "à priori suspicion";

c) help to increase the friendly East-West contacts.

Echoes.

— On May 2nd, Father Pire spoke at Dijon (France) on the occasion of the Centenary of the foundation of the Dominican Convent by Père Lacordaire. He was received by Canon Kire, Mayor of Dijon and member of Parliament.

— In the United States, Fr. Pire was accompanied by his friend and confrère, Rev. Fr. Delville, who acted as interpreter. The two pilgrims of peace, whose journey was, as is were, cut in two by the failure of the Sommet Conference, passed the first week at Chicago, assisting at the "World Brotherhood Conference" already mentioned. They were present at a gathering of one thousand American women, members of four hundred clubs, who conferred the following award on Fr. Pire:

IN APPRECIATION

One who has the compassion and the courage to build eight « European Villages » out of broken men,

One who has the dexterity of soul to give to human-discards the dignity of man,

One who follows the Christ ideal as a true musician renders great music

This Award for Distinguished Service to Humanity is given to

PERE DOMINIQUE GEORGE PIRE

Nobel Peace Laureate 1958

by

The Conference of Club Presidents and Program Chairman.

— On SundayMay 15th, at the University of St. Louis, Fr. Pire received the degree Doctor of Law (honoris causa), a degree which he was also due to receive a few days later at Providence (N. Y.).

Going then to Washington, where he was warmly received at the Belgian Embassy, Fr. Pire and his companion after a successful press conference and useful contacts, arrived at New York, where they spent four profitable days. Fr. Pire records the three following impressions of his journey:

1. The segregation problem ought to be resolved at once and with absolute mutual respect.

2. Americans should fight against "à priori" suspicion which at times paralyses their peace efforts.

3. The American is essentially good. He must act in the world, according to his nature and leave aside all egoism and propaganda.

— Fr. Pire has happy memories of his meeting with the Rotarians of the 167th District, at Touquet (France) and hopes to find among them many "builders of bridges".

Father Pire signs the Golden Book of the town Mayence. To his left, the Bourgomaster, Herr Stein.

— On June 2nd, Fr. Pire was wonderfully received at Mayence (Germany) by the Burgomaster, the Rotary Club and by a very great number of citizens, who heard him speak in German (in a very halting manner) about his peace projects. He would like to keep up the contact with his numerous friends there. Could they please write to him?

ONE WORLD - ONE HEART

I. ACCEPTANCE OF A NOBEL PEACE PRIZE: ACCEPTANCE OF A DUTY

It was on December 10, 1958, at 1,30 p.m. in the Aula of the University of Oslo, in the presence of His Majesty King Olav V of Norway, that I received the Nobel Peace Prize.
Immediately I was struck by several things :

1. That I had received the Nobel Peace Prize for the spirit of my work rather than for its visible and material results.

Mr. Gunnar Jahn, President of the Nobel Committee of the Norwegian Parliament, said in his speech of December 10, in the Aula :

If we were to estimate the importance of his (Father Pire's) work by the number of refugees which he has saved, certain people would perhaps say that the sum of his work was, after all, not so very great. But as is so often the case, one must not base one's judgment on figures only. What is of incomparable greater importance, is the spirit which has given life to the work of Georges Pire, that seed which he has sown in the hearts of men, and which we hope will in time bear fruit in the shape of unselfish labour for those of our fellow-men whose lives are plunged in misery.

2. That I had received the Prize as a pledge for the future rather than as a reward for the past.

I received it at the age of 49, and I am its youngest holder hitherto. Mr. Jahn said to me in his speech at the official dinner held the same evening :

My dear Father Pire, you are a young man, and you have still many years before you. We thank you this evening for your great work and for the results which you have already obtained. It is our ardent wish that many should follow you along the way of the future.

The following day, December 11, in his speech of thanks after my Laureate Speech at the Nobel Institute of Oslo, Mr. Hambro, former President of the League of Nations, said :

You must realize that it is your duty to last. The task that has been entrusted to you is one that will live on, and that task has need of you, of all your energy and the rallying of all your forces. Only a wise stewardship of your energy and your strength can make your efforts bear fruit; it is therefore your duty to use them wisely.

3. That the task entrusted to me for the future is in no way limited to the problem of the refugees (European and otherwise).

This was confirmed by Mr. Jahn in his speech of December 10 :

The work of Father Pire for the refugees, is the work of healing wounds made by the war. However, Father Pire sees further than this. As he himself has said, his aim is to build a « bridge of light and love across the turbulent waters of imperialism, of anti-imperialism, and of racial hatred ». It is even more than this. It is to foster, by practical action, the growth of the spirit of brotherhood among men, among peoples, among races. This same idea finds expression in the last will and testament of Alfred Nobel, in which he declares that the Peace Prize shall be awarded « to him who shall have done the most or the best work for the brotherhood of the nations ». It is with this declaration in mind that the Nobel Committee of the Norwegian Parliament have the great honour and pleasure of awarding the Peace Prize for 1958 to Reverend Father Georges Pire. »

4. In the last resort, the members of that honourable body, the Nobel Committee of the Norwegian Parliament, expect that their candidates will — especially with the aid of the moral « credit » of the Nobel Peace Prize — continue intensively to work for the peace.

On December 10, in the evening, Mr. Jahn spoke as follows :

The corner stone of the League of Nations after the first World War was the hope of building a better world. Its efforts were not successful. However, the dream did not die. The United Nations Organisation proves that it is not dead. But the mere fact of its existence has not eliminated the fear of what might happen to us all in the future. Each day we read and hear of new technical military inventions, of experiments with atom bombs exposing future generations to serious diseases, of the bomb itself, which is able to wipe all life from the face of the earth.

This engenders in us a fear of the future. But fear, of itself, leads to nothing. It is far more important that individual man and woman of all nations should unite under the motto : we will not allow this. We will not use these weapons. Give us rather respect for the rights of the individual, respect for man, in all the countries of the world.

It is only on respect for man, for our neighbour, that we must found the future. This respect must be our guiding motive, not merely the somewhat reserved respect stemming from the intellect and the mind, but the respect which springs from a feeling of brotherhood among men and among nations.

Father Pire, it is not merely that you have recognised the truth of this. It is rather that, in you, the spirit of brotherhood rests on a profound faith in the Gospel of Love, and that this living faith has proved itself in the work that you have already accomplished.

Thus, fully aware of the great responsibility ahead of me, I accepted the Nobel Peace Prize. When receiving it in Oslo I said :

In endeavouring to practise the love of my neighbour, I shall also endeavour in my future work to act in the spirit which Nobel wished should be the norm of men's efforts to achieve one end, that end which is so supremely necessary in our own day, the lasting peace among nations.

The same day I stressed the importance of the Nobel Prize as moral « credit » :

The Nobel Prize has incomparable value as a moral « credit ». The loyalty of those who award it, the dedicated lives of those to whom it is awarded, these are the supreme proof of mutual trust among men. Such trust is the greatest imaginable inspiration by virtue of its extent as well as by its quality.

Finally, in the same speech of thanks I gave expression to my own personal wish on receiving this extraordinary Prize in the middle of my life :

It is my earnest wish to use the moral « credit » of the Nobel Peace Prize in such a way that at my death it will return to you not merely intact, but with interest, increased by the manner in which I shall have used it, so that your successors may one day award a Nobel Peace Prize with an even greater moral « credit », by reason of the fact that your candidate of 1958 used it well.

The Nobel Peace Prize of 1958 is not, indeed cannot be a reward, the end of a career. Rather is it a beginning, a starting afresh, the revival and betterment of all that I have been trying to do for 10 years. It is my desire to concecrate my life to peace, to the brotherhood of men. I am deeply aware of the responsibility contained in those words of a friend : « From now on, you belong to the dream of peace in the heart of every man ».

II. MAN, MY BROTHER

At the beginning of any serious work for peace it is necessary to have a chart to which all men of good will submit.

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world...

This is the beginning of the preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted on December 10, 1948, by the General Assembly of the United Nations. I warmly recommend that every reader of this Manifesto should attentively re-read the 30 articles of this Declaration, some of which are quoted hereunder.

ARTICLE 1. — All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

ARTICLE 2. — Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-selfgoverning or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

ARTICLE 3. — Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

ARTICLE 18. — Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

ARTICLE 19. — Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

ARTICLE 28. — Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Our work shall rest on this noble Declaration and we will see what we can do together for the peace (1).

(1) This Declaration is rejoined by the one, made in 1954 by the second Assembly of the Œcumenical Council of Churches, representing 163 churches in 48 countries. Father Léonard reports that this Assembly considered the problem of « the common life in a divided world » and proposed a minimum of conditions which are necessary to realize this.

Reverend Father Pire and Mr. Otto Frank — father of Anne Frank — visiting the European Village in Aachen (Germany).

III. BY ALL MEN, FOR ALL MEN

For a whole year I prayed much and pondered the responsibilities which were laid upon me in Oslo on December 10 and 11, 1958. And at once I realized that, by myself, I could do nothing. I surrounded myself, therefore, with faithful friends, of widely divergent religions and philosophical beliefs, yet all united in their desire to serve peace by concrete and effective means.

Thus, from the outset, we are a group of friends embarking upon an experiment hitherto never made : that of uniting our efforts to put the moral « credit » of the Nobel Peace Prize to the widest possible use. To this initial group of friends are joined all those people who write to me from every corner of the world, putting their good will at my disposal. And we, in turn, will put that good will at the service of all men, whosoever they may be.

You will find this same spirit of universality aiming for peace in the statutes of an association, founded by me on June 5, 1959, under the name of « The Heart open to the World ». The statutes of this association, in accordance with the law of my country, are published in the official Belgian journal entitled : « Le Moniteur Belge » of June 11, 1959, No. 3051. Here is an extract from the statutes in question :

ARTICLE 3. — The aim of the Association is :

1. To engage the practical interest of every man, or every group of men, in behalf of any kind of human distress, be it individual or collective.

2. To seek to relieve this distress by every available means : friendship (sponsorship), social work, etc...

3. To create a « world of the heart » around this distress, and thus unite all men, breaking down all the barriers which so frequently separate them.

4. To enable young people to realize their ideal of practical and benevolent help to suffering humanity.

5. To further or support any activities capable of fostering understanding and brotherly love among men.

6. In particular, to help Father Pire to use, for the benefit of mankind, the moral « credit » with which the Nobel Peace Prize has provided him. To foster to this end an association « Friends of Father Pire », and a « Group of Councillors », to procure the necessary means, material or otherwise, to realize all the above mentioned aims.

A similar association will be founded in any country in which I can find a suitable and efficient help and support and where there are problems to be solved. All the associations will be joined together in one international organisation. However, and this must be said at once, this federation of associations is not an aim itself — it is merely a means, destined to provide a legal basis for all those other endeavours which will be the heart of all our efforts.

IV. UNDERLYING PRINCIPLES OF OUR WORK

The course of action which I have been trying to put into practice for the last 10 years has developed on two complementary planes. The aim of the one is to relieve the physical and moral distress of our suffering brethrens — the uprooted, displaced Europeans. The aim of the other is the same work of charity, only this time conceived as essentially a work practised in common, and thus bringing men closer together, breaking down the prejudices and barriers which divide mankind.

For the future we wish to retain this double plane action, which can be summed up in two words: Aid, Dialogue. Aid to those who suffer. Dialogue among those who seek to bring the relief. It is possible to see this double plane as leading to action of an increasingly deeper nature, which itself has three levels:

1. Action practised in common for the relief of human misery wherever it may be found and under whatever label. Even at this level there is much to be done in the present day world. Valuable help can be given by the courageous defiance of prohibitions, political prejudices, contempt and injustices by which men find themselves surrounded — ranging oneself — « à priori » on the side of the victims.

2. At the second level, each man and woman working in such a group, will salute and acknowledge the nobility of the inspiration which has drawn all the others from their widely divergent walks of life, to devote themselves to the same work.

Here already is the beginning of the Dialogue. It is now no longer simply a question of common work — however courageous — in caring for the « looked after » unhappy people. We have come to the point where each worker is ready to explore new vistas of the mind, where the horizons of Christian, Moslem, Jew, Agnostic, open up to each other. In his book « Le Sens du dialogue » (1), p. 129, the philosopher Jean Lacroix quotes Péguy's phrase a propos of Bergson and Descartes: « They prefer partners to partisans ». And he adds: « When the Christian puts aside clerical politics and the Jew Jewish politics, then each — in discovering the other — makes a more profound discovery of himself ». And he continues: « The first step, and that which is a necessary condition of all the others, is not so much to denounce the partisan spirit in one's neighbour, as to destroy it in oneself, thus desiring that the « other », too, shall be fully himself. A man who does not practise dialogue is a fanatic: he misunderstands himself as completely as he misunderstands others. A man does not release his potentials, in fact, does not even know himself except through the mediation of others: by destroying the dialogue he destroys himself as surely as he destroys others. To stiffen into a partisan oneself is a sure way to make partisans of others, just as to open one's mind to them is a sure means of turning them into partners. I can only be myself by continuously desiring that thou shalt be thyself. »

Thus one offers not only one's heart to the suffering but also one's mind to one's co-workers in the relief of suffering. Their horizon, it is true, will continue differing vastly from each other, but the spirit of approach will be to use Gilson's admirable phrase: « A cordial agreement to disagree ».

3. From this point we can reach a third and even higher level. At this level everybody readily consents to re-view through other glasses the intellectual and spiritual foundations of his conception of the world as well as of his actions. This would not be done in any spirit of proselytism or rivalry, but rather with a profound respect for the truth of others. It would eliminate all prejudices, all preconceived notions, arbitrary simplifications and stereotyped ideas, which so often dim the clear vision of matters and of human beings. It would mean searching positively for the points of contact and thus ensure a better mutual understanding of the varying conceptions of life, which conceptions are underlying everybody's action.

We should, I think, here remind ourselves of the phrase of an English mystic: « Sincere people reach each other by the way of the heart, not by way of frontiers ».

Thus, the « Heart open to the World » would be much more and much better than a simple aid, be it even collective, for the relief of material distress. It would, above all, be a step forward to the deeper thought and deeper principles which are the first pre-requisites of any movement towards universal brotherhood, an effort of the spirit, which would ultimately make each one of us accept the « other » for his « otherness » with all his differences.

V. CONCRETE AND MODEST PASSAGE TO ACTION

Whether we be on the plane of relief to the suffering or on the plane of dialogue, we must, however, pass on to action, unless we wish to meet the fate of so many generous but vague plans which ended in nothing. Our efforts in the field of action will be but modest, yet concrete. Modest, on account of the overwhelming disparity between the work to be done on the one hand and the means and manpower on the other. At the outset we have but a handful of people of good will, and material resources which are but a ridiculous pittance in the face of the tasks ahead of us. We have, it is true, the moral support and « credit » of the Nobel Peace Prize, with which we hope to increase the number of good will as well as our material resources.

Our passing into action, as well as the activities themselves must remain in the realm of the concrete. The necessity for concrete action is forced upon us from outside, be it only by a part of the enormous mail which each day reaches me from all corners of the world. Even there we have, together with the first group of friends, found it necessary to select from this mail a certain number of problems, so as not to be bogged under by attempting to do everything at once. « He who takes too many things in his arms cannot embrace them tightly. »

1. Fraternal Dialogue between Black and White People.

We are setting up an exchange system (letters, journals, visits...) between Black young men and women from Africa and White young people living outside Africa.

2. Relief to our Suffering Brethren.

The government of the Moslem State of Pakistan have commissioned me to work for 10 million Moslem refugees in that country. On the one hand, the problem of poverty and displaced people. On the other, the awakening of heart and conscience of the more fortunate among the Pakistanis as well as of the more fortunate in our own countries.

3. Help of the Healthy to the Sick.

To relieve the problem of tuberculosis in an African country. This to be done with teams of doctors and medical students.

4. World Unity.

All men are equal, all are brothers. No frontier, no « curtain » can really divide the fraternal world of men. Likewise, peace is the right of every man. And a Nobel Peace Prize is the servant of that peace to which every man is entitled. We shall therefore endeavour to the best of our ability to bring efficient help to our brothers living behind the Iron Curtain, avoiding however everything that could compromise our work and without risk for our co-workers. At present, this help can only be rendered by means of personal contacts, the advantage of these being to avoid the above mentioned obstacles and, through friendship, to give encouragement as well as material help.

5. Young People and the World of the Heart.

If we, the 50 year old ones, dream of a World of the Heart, it will be the young people who will make this world. The youth must therefore have much place in our efforts. Hundreds of young men and women, from many countries, have volunteered for manual and other labour during their holiday. I was not able to accept these offers for 1959 as I was myself overburdened and overworked. I have, however, accepted them for 1960. As the Villages for the Displaced Persons are being built by professional labour, I cannot enlist the services of the young people in this field. But another project is already being undertaken. It is a house for young people of university-student age, where training sessions will be organised for youth of both sexes. Laying of the foundation stone : beginning of April 1960. Date of opening : August 1960.

6. Dialogue.

On the dialogue plane, it is obvious that points 1 and 5 hold many possibilities for exchange. Among others, we are considering two forms of dialogues : meetings and a magazine. Like the rest of the programme, the meetings will have to be modest and concrete — gathering however influential personalities and representatives from different walks of life, as for instance former Nobel Peace Prize holders and other Nobel Prize holders interested in world problems.

The first number of this magazine appeared in January 1960 in the simple form of a bulletin called : From Heart to Heart. It is written in three languages : French, English and German. It will keep you informed about the development of the little programme outlined above. We should like it to become a sort of « crossroad where all can meet in writing ».

VI. FINANCIAL BASIS

A sound financial basis is necessary even when the aid to the sick and the suffering is reduced to its simplest form. A minimum of financial stability is essential to ensure the functioning of the World of the Heart (secretariate, travelling, exchanges, etc...). We have chosen the simplest solution : to make a clear distinction between, on the one hand the aid and the dialogue, and on the other the search for funds. This last is entrusted to an organisation bearing the simple name of « Friends of Father Pire ». No doubt, the divulgation of our plans will soon bring us generous support from men and women who dream, as we do, of a world of brotherly love and who have great financial means at their disposal. Apart from this, however, the smallest gifts given from the heart will also be equally welcome.

VII TO THE READER OF THIS MANIFESTO

And you dear friends, who have finished reading this Manifesto, will without doubt, and with reason, ask yourselves the following question : where do I come in ?

Now the first requisite, since we wish to make a team of it, is to become more fully acquainted with each other and with the work. In this connection I would draw your attention to a biography of the Nobel Peace Prize of 1958, written by Hugues Véhenne, who has brought to the task not only his brilliant talent, but also the best sources of information.

could give of your personal help. Ahead of us lies the task of spreading the movement « Friends of Father Pire » which is to provide the material basis of our work. In this connection, here are a few items of practical information :

VIII. PROVISIONAL CONCLUSION

This little Manifesto falls between a past composed of ten years of work in the service of the uprooted, in the service of unity among men, and a future, as yet shrouded in darkness, but slowly beginning to unfold. Between this past and this future stands the Nobel Prize for Peace. It is to you personally, my dear friends, that I give in trust the great moral « credit » of that Prize. We will use it together for the peace of the world, without harbouring too many illusions about the importance of whatever results we may be able to achieve; yet, on the other hand, without under-estimation of the vast and immense possibilities open to us if we earnestly desire them. In his will Alfred Nobel has envisaged his Prize for Peace as a reward to those who had worked most or best in the cause of peace. Because of our lack of material means we shall not be able to achieve the « most ». But we can achieve the « best », and the « best » is that intensity of love with which each shall go out towards his brothers, and help them, in brotherly exchange of minds and hearts.

Dear Ed:

Some time ago, we spoke inviting you to be the guest of honor at a going-away dinner, but you asked for a rain check and suggested that we have a dinner upon your return. Well, now we would like to pick up that rain check and turn the Mike & Screen Press Dinner into an appropriate "Welcom Home" party for Edward R. Murrow, the newsmen's newsman.

The project was approved last night by unanimous vote of the Board of Governors, who urged me to use all haste in contacting you since every moment of time between now and June would be needed to make this dinner tasteful and successful in every way. We would, of course, also need to know your definite return date.

You will be pleased to know, Ed, that the Association is growing. A successful dinner of this type would be an important attention-getter for this organization which gives voice to the problems of radio-newsreel-television newsmen in their professional pursuit of news. In fact, the Association frequently is the only voice to be heard fighting the battle for equal access, freedom of information, and equality of treatment with the printed Press.

What do you say? Will you be our guest of honor for a Mike & Screen Press Dinner on your return in June? We are all hoping so. Just let us know your decision quickly.

Every good wish.

Sincerely,

June 15, 1960

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I am writing you, because you represent to me an integrity in the field of communications and an expertness of news analysis which speaks for itself.

Like many young Americans (I am twenty-five), I am concerned for the leadership in this country which many would agree has been found lacking in recent years. I believe, one man, Adlai E. Stevenson, has shown himself to be of a stature of leadership that we, the young, so heartily admire in the world today. Why is it that the historian and the newsman cannot combine their talents to visually demonstrate this leadership? You showed the United States the tyranny of McCartheism---why do you not show to the public the history of our recent political doldroms?

Mr. Stevenson and President Eisenhower have debated in two campaigns---their words have been many, their images widely seen by the American people. Mr. Nixon has spoken and acted for the public. Why not take the pictorial coverage of the last eight years---basic issue by basic issue---taking the words of our political leaders---and visually connect them with the world news events of those same eight years. An example would be Stevenson's statement on the hydrogen bomb ban in 1956 and his opponents counter-statements; and then the Geneva discussions going on at the present moment. Another example would be---solution of the farm problem---statements by the candidates (pictorially as well as verbally) and then a flash at the present farm crisis with statements by the farmers. Take the issues-take the candidates' words-show the present situation.

I believe that this country needs an enlightened and an eloquent leader, and I think, above all, they have to be shown by image and word what it is they want. Make it historical so that they understand the past in terms of the present world situation. As one among many, I plead with you, the leader in mass communication newscoverage, to give the American people the truth as counter to the trite they are being handed in such programs as the series "Journey to Understanding."

Thank you for your patience in reading this letter (if so you do).

Dear Mr. Field:

Thank you for your letter of July 20th to Mr. Murrow. As he is at the political convention in Chicago, I am taking the liberty of answering you in his stead.

Unfortunately, because of the pressure of his schedule for the coming year and the uncertain nature of his CBS commitments, Mr. Murrow has decided to make a general ruling against accepting any speaking engagements, however attractive they may be.

Thank you again for asking him.

Attn: Gabrielle Wachsner, Secretary

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Please refer to our letter of April 12, 1960, concerning our Fall lecture program on Conformity, a Modern American Problem and Miss Wachsner's responsive letter of April 19, 1960. Miss Wachsner indicated that until your fall broadcasting schedule had been finalized it would be impossible for you to consider any speaking engagements.

We are now in the process of finalizing our own program and should like to know if it is now possible for you to accept our invitation to participate in our program. We would very much regret your absence were we not to at least explore every reasonable means within our power to make your participation possible.

Of the dates indicated in our original letter, we would be most pleased to have you as our guest on Wednesday, November 16 or November 23. November 2 and November 9 may also be available though perhaps less desirable due to the Fall Election.

From the standpoint of the time period required in San Francisco, we are requesting our speakers to arrive at least one day before their presentation. Such an arrival will permit a press interview before the actual night of the program. If overriding time schedules clearly prevent any of our speakers from arriving in the Bay area one day in advance of their program, we have decided to simply cancel press interviews. It is our feeling that due to the time pressure on most of our speakers press considerations must, of necessity, remain secondary.

By way of general information, we have obtained for this series the newly built Masonic Temple, the largest and most modern facilities ever used for a lecture presentation in Northern California. Up to this time, we have contracted with Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas and Mr. Robert A. Hutchins and are negotiating with Mr. Archibald MacLeish, Mr. E. E. Cummings and Dr. Karl Menninger.

Though we anticipated some local interest in our topic, Conformity, a Modern American Problem, the enthusiasm and interest aroused by this topic has far exceeded our expectations. Local citizenry and educational circles with whom we have tentatively broached the possibility of your coming have been particularly responsive. There is no question, in fact, that your presentation would constitute a key address. We consequently look forward with particular interest to hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Yours truly,

Jerome Field

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On consecutive Wednesdays commencing November 2, 1960, we are presenting a series of five sixty to ninety minute lectures bearing the generic title, Conformity A Modern American Problem. We would be honored to have you as one of our speakers.

Our series is designed to afford persons, of established reputation, in various fields of endeavor an opportunity to freely express their ideas in a "no holds barred" lecture on any subject which the word conformity brings to mind. Each lecturer will be given the broadest latitude in expressing his ideas in the area with which he is most familiar, i.e., Business, the Social Sciences, the Physical Sciences, Philosophy, Politics, Art, Theatre, and Music.

We are approaching only persons whom we feel would be most appropriate for a serious lecture program, academic in spirit albeit of popular appeal. None of our speakers are "Professional Lecturers" as such, all however are established figures within their respective fields.

Our newly formed organization has as its long term objective the establishment of a provocative and informative program of lectures, bringing to the San Francisco Bay area members of the academic and non-academic community whose ideas and opinions will intellectually excite their audiences. We feel that you number among this group.

If you are "taken" with our topic and idea we should appreciate hearing from you as to your fee and availability for a San Francisco lecture of the type described. We have reserved consecutive Wednesdays commencing November 2, 1960, and running through December 7, 1960 for the event. In any case your opinion on our program would certainly be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

Jerome Field

Dear Mr. Feinstein:

Please forgive the delay in giving you an answer to your very kind invitation conveyed to Mr. Murrow in your letter of January 22nd. Mr. Murrow has been traveling extensively in the Far East, and we have only just received his reply.

He has asked me to tell you how deeply honored he is by the desire of the State of Israel Bond Organization to confer upon him the Medallion of Valor Award. He would have been delighted to be able to accept this, but unfortunately, it would appear from certain radio and television commitments made for the coming season, that there is every likelihood of his being out of the country during the latter part of November, which would of course make it impossible for him to attend the dinner in Philadelphia on Sunday evening, November 20th.

Will you please convey to your Committee Mr. Murrow's profound regrets.

Dear Miss Wachsner:

At a meeting of the Committee on Awards held yesterday, the State of Israel Commendation Dinner program was reviewed. You will recall that on January 22, Mayor Richardson Dilworth extended our invitation to Mr. Edward R. Murrow to receive the Medallion of Valor Award next November.

I have been instructed to inform you that definite acceptances have already been received from the Honorable Lester Pearson, former President of the United Nations Assembly; Mr. Ed Sullivan; General Lucius D. Clay, former United States High Commissioner for Germany; and we also expect Mr. George Meany, President of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations; Frank Sinatra; the Honorable Herbert H. Lehman; and Mr. Paul Muni. There is a possibility that both Mr. Herbert Hoover and Mr. Bernard Baruch will also grace the dais.

It is our hope that we shall soon have word from you or from Mr. Murrow letting us know that his presence will be added to this illustrious roster. You may be sure, however, that we shall exercise whatever patience is necessary until a reply - which we hope shall be favorable - is received by us.

MEDALLION OF VALOR AWARD

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

New York City, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Few men, in the course of a lifetime, have the opportunity to help shape the political, economic, social or cultural destiny of a nation. In our own time, the rebirth of the State of Israel has brought to the fore a limited number of men who, through their interest in the advancement of freedom and human dignity throughout the world, have helped create the character of Israel through the selfless contribution of their time, energy and talents in their respective fields of endeavor.

On Sunday evening, November 20, 1960, at the Bellevue Stratford Hotel in Philadelphia, ten such men will receive the grateful acknowledgement of the people and Government of Israel at the State of Israel Commendation Dinner in their honor. It is uniquely appropriate that the City of Philadelphia, the birthplace of liberty, in America and a symbol of freedom for all mankind, has been selected as the situs of this most significant convocation.

On behalf of the State of Israel Bond Organization, under whose sponsorship this international event will be held, it is our great privilege to notify you of your selection as one of those so to be honored, and to invite you to accept the Medallion of Valor Award of the State of Israel at this notable occasion. At the request of the Israel Government, the presentations will be made by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

It is with the deepest sense of appreciation for your efforts in bringing to the attention of objective and freedom loving people throughout the world a more firmly based understanding of the issues which have so painfully disrupted the Middle East that you have been designated for this special recognition.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This letter is written to invite you to give a John F. Murray Memorial Lecture on this campus, as a representative of the field of mass communications.

The details of the lectureship are set out on the enclosed descriptive sheets; I'll simply mention here that such a lecturer is brought to the campus for a major public address by one of the three participating units, the School of Journalism, the College of Law, or the College of Commerce, and that it has been the custom also for the lecturer to spend some additional time, usually two days, on the campus, primarily to give students an opportunity to talk about major problems in the speaker's special area of competence.

It has been the feeling that in this way the lecturer can make an important contribution to the "feeling" of students for the deeper professional concerns of his particular field--and, of course, we're conscious also of the fact that this experience will be most helpful for faculty members as well. Usually the lecturer sits down with a student group for a discussion of professional problems; ordinarily many of the group are graduate students. There is also a luncheon or a dinner at which there is opportunity for the speaker to become better acquainted with the faculty members of the school or college which is arranging for his appearance. And ordinarily there's opportunity for the lecturer to spend some time talking with people he'd like to see.

An honorarium of $1,000 plus travel expense is provided for the lecturer.

The lecture is usually in an area of special interest to the speaker, and one which he feels is of much public import. For example, Erwin Canham talked on "A Free Press in a Free World" and Geoffrey Crowther of the London Economist talked on "Free Enterprise Versus Planned Economy."

Each lecture is published in booklet form, and given wide distribution to university and major public libraries, to schools of journalism, and to workers in the mass communications field.

The days you would spend with us could be scheduled pretty much at your convenience; we have found that a Monday-Tuesday-Wednesday or a Wednesday-Thursday-Friday unit is usually the best, because the lecture is ordinarily scheduled on a Tuesday or a Thursday night (Wednesday night is usually reserved for musical events).

I suggest, tentatively, a date in May, between May 2 and May 27. If this isn't workable, perhaps we can talk about a date next fall.

We hope very much that you can be with us.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie G. Moeller
Director

THE JOHN F. MURRAY LECTURESHIP AT THE STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

PURPOSES

The purposes of the Murray Lectureship are several, but the major purposes are these:

(a) The advancement of public knowledge and the increasing of public concern with regard to an important topic in the field of the lecturer's interest and competence, through the presentation of a lecture to which faculty, students, and the general public are invited.

(b) The providing of an opportunity for contact between the lecturer, and the students and faculty in the appropriate areas, primarily for the discussion, both formal and informal, of matters of professional concern in the lecturer's field of specialization.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Through the provisions of the will of Mrs. Bessie Dutton Murray the State University of Iowa has received an endowment fund forthe John F. Murray lectureship (and for Murray scholarships), as a memorial of her late husband, an Iowan who was for many years a successful executive, with much of his work in advertising.

When Mr. Murray as a young man was employed as a purser on a Lake Michigan steamer he met William Wrigley, Jr., the chewing gum magnate. Wrigley was attracted by Murray's manner, and hired him to tour the southeastern states as a promoter for the Wrigley Company. The success of the trip led to Murray's appointment as advertising man for the company in New York City, where he coined the successful trade name, "Juicy Fruit." Later Murray set up his own advertising agency, and in 1909 created the Murray Newspaper Service and the Murray Syndicate Cut Service. He also formed a chemical company which ultimately absorbed several drug companies and became the American Home Products Corporation.

After Mr. Murray's death in 1936 Mrs. Murray returned to her native town of Wheatland, Iowa, where she lived until her death in 1945. Her will set up not only the Murray Lectureship, but also $500 scholarships awarded each year to students in the College of Commerce, the College of Law, and the School of Journalism.

The first Murray Lecture was held in 1952; sponsorship and selection of the lecturer rotates among the Colleges of Commerce and Law and the School of Journalism.

PROCEDURE ON CAMPUS

Ordinarily the Murray Lecturer is on the campus for about three days, with his public lecture on the evening of one of these.

It has been the custom, while the Murray Lecturer is on the campus, to arrange for several events, in addition to the lecture, which give students and faculty the benefit of contacts with him.

Usually these activities include a conference, ordinarily a discussion session, with students and faculty members; a luncheon or dinner with the faculty of the school or college immediately concerned, and with top university administrative officials; and, if time permits, coffee hours with students and faculty. On the occasion of Mr. Crowther's visit, a symposium on foreign trade was arranged. (His schedule was such that it was possible for him to spend five days in Iowa City, a circumstance which is most welcome even though it is understood that not all speakers will be able to stay for so long a time.) Mr. Canham sat in for an hour with a class in international communications, and appeared before another journalism class also; other lecturers have similarly carried on discussion sessions with classes in their specialized fields.

PUBLICATION

Each Murray lecture is published in booklet form, with distribution to educational institutions in the fields involved, libraries, newspapers, radio and television stations, and persons with a special interest in the topic. Usually one thousand to fifteen hundred copies are distributed.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Since 1955 the State Historical Society of Wisconsin and the University of Wisconsin have been working together to develop a Mass Communications History Center. Our project was prompted by a realization that there was very little documentation pertaining to mass communications history and its role as a major force in American history. We envisioned and established the Center as a central depository which would collect and preserve the papers and source materials of the important men and organizations in the various fields of mass communications. We have made considerable progress with our collecting activity; at the same time our collecting program and our thinking about this project have indicated clearly that there are major problems in conceptualizing the field of mass communications history so that meaningful research can be undertaken.

The Rockefeller Foundation has recently made a grant to the State Historical Society which will make it possible for us to hold a conference to explore and discuss some of these problems with historians and mass communications scholars as well as practitioners and critics of the communications media. Harold Lasswell, Paul Lazarsfeld, and Charles Siepmann, all of whom indicated an interest in our conference idea during its formative stage, have agreed to participate in our meeting. We would like very much for you to be one of the participants.

We have invited the conferees to meet here in Madison from April 7 through April 9, 1960, and we expect a group of twelve to fifteen. We are prepared to pay your transportation expense and an honorarium of $100.

We want this conference to have maximum freedom for the development and discussion of problems concerned with an historical approach to research in mass communications. If you are able to accept our invitation, we will send you working papers which will include a description of the development of our Mass Communications History Center and some of the ideas of the University of Wisconsin faculty and Society staff concerning our project. We will also ask you and your fellow conferees for your preliminary thinking on one or two of the basic problems which we have confronted. Your statements will form the focus for our opening session.

I hope you will agree to be one of the participants. I look forward to hearing from you in the near future.

Let me also take this opportunity to mention another matter. I assumed the directorship of the Society in August and in looking over the records of the Center, I found a notation that your personal papers were to go to the Library of Congress. However, there was no correspondence to or from you in our files. I would appreciate it very much if I could get your confirmation of this notation. If you papers are uncommitted, we would, of course, be most interested in making them a part of the Mass Communications History Center and I would be happy to send you more details about the Center and formally request that they be deposited here.

With all good wishes.

Sincerely,

Leslie H. Fishel, jr.

Strategy for Peace Conference

December 2, 1960

Dear Messrs. Slick and Stanley:

Many thanks for your letter of November 29th.

I greatly appreciate your invitation to participate in the second Conference in January and very much regret that I cannot accept. The fact is that my radio and television commitments for the next months are such that I have had to decide to devote myself to that side of my work and not undertake any extracurricular activities no matter how tempting they may be.

Thank you for asking me again.

Sincerely yours,

Messrs. Tom Slick and C. M. Stanley

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We were indeed sorry you could not attend the "Conference to Plan a Strategy for Peace" of leaders in business and the professions at Arden House, Harriman, New York, in June 1960. We were then and are still convinced that wise recommendations for long-range comprehensive planning can come from the concerted efforts of people from many fields of endeavor.

Because participants at the June Conference considered it of such great value, they have urged that another be held. We are therefore planning to meet at Arden House for the weekend of Thursday evening, January 12th, to Sunday noon, January 15th, 1961, to continue discussion of fresh approaches in planning U. S. policies for a secure and just peace. Many of those attending the first Conference will again be present.

There will be separate discussion groups in the following categories:

1. Arms Control - to explore in depth the requirements of a military posture which will permit negotiation of safeguarded arms control measures.

2. Short-Range Specifics and Components of a Strategy for Peace - economic development, cold war tactics, psychological warfare, United Nations, etc.

3. Long-Range Specifics and Components of a Strategy for Peace - world law, disarmament, economic development, United Nations, etc.

Mrs. Albert D. Lasker, as co-host, joins us in hoping you can accept this invitation to be a participant in the second Conference. We look forward to hearing from you at your early convenience. Will you indicate the discussion group in which you wish to participate. Working papers, details about transportation from New York, etc., will be sent to you later.

The story of the first Conference as it appeared in BUSINESS WEEK and the schedule for the January Conference are enclosed. Under separate cover you will receive the Final Report of the first Conference including a list of the participants.

Since we will meet on the eve of the inauguration of a new administration, the timing of the second Conference, we believe, is of great significance.

Sincerely yours,

Tom Slick C M Stanley

ARDEN HOUSE at Harriman, N. Y., was scene of discussions by 130 U. S. leaders in many fields on how to attain just and secure peace.

Experts Tackle Riddle Of Strategy for Peace

Economists, businessmen, defense planners find common approach to world's danger, and some agreement on steps to take for greater stability.

For four days last week 130 of the smarter people in America holed up at Arden House, Harriman, N. Y., to discuss what is, beyond doubt, the most important—and the most difficult—problem facing the world: how to attain a secure and just peace.

The conference—the brainchild of Tom Slick, of the Texstar Corp.—was no academic bull session; it brought together some of the people who "created" the Twentieth Century's greatest problem—living with the atom bomb—and many of the people who have been playing key roles in U. S. national security policy and planning.

Among the conferees, for instance, was Leo Szilard, the physicist who first urged Einstein to write the famous letter to Pres. Roosevelt about the feasibility of building an atom bomb. On the military side were Gen. J. Lawton Collins, outstanding World War II leader who played a critical role in planning postwar defensive strategy around the smaller and cleaner nuclear bombs (Collins is now vice-chairman of the board of Pfizer International Inc.); Lt. Gen. James Gavin, former chief of Army Research & Development (now president of Arthur D. Little, Inc.); and Gen. William H. Draper, who played a top role in putting Germany together after the war, in building NATO, and in many other assignments.

The Arden House meetings brought such people into face-to-face discussion with some of the country's top defense researchers, international relations experts, businessmen, psychologists, economists, lawyers, and—in the self-deprecating phrase of one of them—"peace-mongers" from foundations such as the Institute for International Order and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

• Wide Agreement—The conference thus represented an assemblage of hard military planners, idealists, businessmen, and scholars. The remarkable result of this intermingling was that it did not result in chaos, or in a brawl between peace-mongers and preparers for war—as many of the conferees themselves, during the early hours of the meeting, assumed it would.

On the contrary, it achieved a high degree of agreement on over-all U. S. strategy for peace. In fact, by the time the conference was over, it was clear that, as they faced the technological and political realities and dangers of our time, there was no sharp line between war and peace mongers. Everyone was driven to recognize that the world is now up against, as Leo Szilard put it, "a wholly novel problem."

• What the Problem Is—That novel problem is this:

A state of conflict exists between the great powers: The Communists, led by the U.S.S.R., have declared their intention to make a world revolution; the non-Communist powers, led by the U. S., have declared their determination to prevent this. In the past, force—and the threat of force—played a major role in resolving or freezing such national conflicts. And at present there is no substitute for the threat of force in sight for this end.

But the forces that each side can use as a threat today—or, possibly tomorrow, when the stage of invulnerable long-range rockets with H-bomb warheads is fully reached—are so terrible that no power that goes to war could hope to survive that war.

Szilard, who left a hospital to come to the meeting, laid particular stress on the virtual certainty that any major war between the great powers would become a nuclear war—even if you first got rid of all existing nuclear bombs.

That would be true because the world can no longer rid itself of the knowledge of how to make nuclear bombs; and nations, threatened with destruction, would put that knowledge to use once more if the stake was winning or losing a war. No one at the conference argued that this was improbable.

I. World's Dilemma

Yet the roots of conflict between the Communists and the Free World exist, and there is no way, the conferees agreed, to resolve that conflict overnight. Hence, the threat of force must be used to safeguard the peace for a while longer—no one could say how much longer.

That leaves the U. S., the U.S.S.R., and the world facing this dilemma: In the years ahead the threat of force will continue to be indispensable. War between the great powers will have no payoff for any nation. But conflict between the two ideologies and between national blocs persists, and will not soon disappear, since neither side shows any intention of surrendering.

ITEK'S Richard Leghorn got wide support for over-all plan for U. S. peace strategy.

RAND CORP.'S Herman Kahn proposed scheme to check growth of nuclear powers.

LEO CHERNE of Research Institute, said disarmament would be gradual and costly.

This is not a dilemma that makes for easy sleeping. It involves, in fact, terrifying instabilities. Herman Kahn, of the RAND Corp., which does strategic thinking and research for the Air Force, summed them up:

• Dangers of surprise attack. A nation, if it thought it could get away with an attack that would knock out most of another nation's retaliatory power, might take the gamble.

• Dangers of accidental war. It has been said that, under some circumstances, a flight of geese showing up on a radar screen might mean the end of the world. The technical experts from the military said at Arden House that this was nonsense; that there are adequate checks to prevent it. But there are real dangers, all agreed, of accidental war resulting from political events—from a miscalculated gamble on Berlin, say, or on Formosa.

• Dangers of provocation. Nation A might tempt Nation B to attack Nation C, so that Nation B would finally get into a war and could be knocked out, without danger to Nation A. Kahn noted that Pres. de Gaulle of France had spoken recently of the "melancholy circumstance" in which the U. S. might wipe out Eastern Europe, and the U.S.S.R. wipe out Western Europe. In strategic thinking, this would be a massive instance of the "tit-for-tat" threat.

• Multiplying the Danger—De Gaulle's solution to this problem, obviously, has been to get nuclear arms of his own to deter attacks on his own nation. But this leads to compounding the instability, as other nations are driven to do the same thing.

This is what the specialists refer to as the "Nth-Country Problem." They mean that the U. S. was the first country to have the bomb, the Soviet Union the second, Britain the third . . . and so on until a decade from now, the Nth country will have it.

The instabilities are great enough when only a few countries have these ultimate weapons, but when virtually all countries acquire them (and the economic costs of doing that, the experts say, will be quite modest for a nation in the decade ahead), the dangers of war from surprise attack, accident, or provocation—possibly anonymous provocation—will become enormous. When one of the possible N countries is Red China, it gives even the boldest planners nightmares.

• Freezing Out All Others—RAND's Kahn, one of the last men in the world who could be suspected of wanting to appease the Russians, proposed to his seminar at the conference a solution to the "Nth country" problem. It was that the U. S. should immediately make a treaty with the Soviet Union, under which both would undertake to declare war on any other nation that aggressively used an atomic bomb against other countries. In effect, the U. S. and U.S.S.R. would kick everybody else out of the nuclear club. Kahn thought this deal could be negotiated immediately.

Kahn's logic was that both the Russians and the U. S. have reasons for not letting other nations start nuclear wars which would be likely sooner or later to explode in their respective faces. This would also, he said, remove the incentive for "N" countries to acquire the bombs at all.

Other conferees thought Kahn's proposed "Pax Russo-Americana" was a "gimmick," which, for political reasons, made no sense. It would mean that the U. S. would make its NATO allies angry, and Russia would do the same to Communist bloc nations.

Yet there was a feeling among many that, whether Kahn's specific scheme was practical or not, there was strong reason for recognizing that the logic of events made it imperative to prevent the spread of nuclear bombs to other powers, and to keep them from using those bombs in a war. The Russians have consistently staved off Chinese demands for atomic bombs; they recently turned down a Chinese request for a big "peaceful" reactor.

II. No Easy Road

The conference was far from concluding that it—or anybody else—yet had answers to all these problems, or even the means for finding the answers. Indeed, in a series of resolutions, it suggested better means of working out the answers rather than proposing any ready-made answers itself.

GEN. LAWTON COLLINS opposed gambling with Russians on total disarmament.

It called for:

• Basic research and planning in the entire arms control field—including the military, political, diplomatic, legal, economic, and technological facets of the problem. This research, it declared, should devote equal attention to the short-range problem of next steps toward arms control and the long-range problem of the kind of world peace system toward which the U. S. should be working.

• Establishment of a permanent staff "at a high level" within the U. S. government to work on problems of arms control. This was a generally phrased endorsement of Adlai Stevenson's proposal that an agency be set up within the State Dept. to work on problems for achieving a secure peace. The group was not sure, however, where it wanted the permanent staff located—in the White House, at the State Dept., in the Pentagon, in the National Science Foundation, or elsewhere.

• U. S. support for a United Nations corps of experts to develop methods and techniques of arms control.

• A greatly expanded and coordinated research effort by universities and other research centers on strategy for peace.

• Central Problem—But the group did not stop with an endorsement of research—which some conferees thought was like endorsing "motherhood."

It did reach substantive agreement on one of the biggest issues: whether to "live with the bomb" or to live without it in the period immediately ahead. In effect, this is the question posed by Khrushchev's proposals for total disarmament, the latest version of which came out while the conference was in session.

JEROME WIESNER of MIT called for all-out R&D push on arms control.

ARTHUR LARSON, Eisenhower adviser, saw international rule of law evolving.

On this issue, the conference reached overwhelming agreement that it was necessary to go on living with the bomb, and in effect to use the bomb as the only sure means of preserving peace in the short run. At the same time, it plumped squarely for checking and reversing the arms race. In carefully measured language, the conferees declared:

"We look upon arms control measures as an essential means of enhancing national security and international peace. Their efficacy must be measured in terms of the degree to which they contribute to these goals. From this view, arms control and armament are not contradictory, but rather complementary aspects of a responsible national security policy."

III. Three-Way Plan

Although the conference did not formally spell out in detail just what this over-all position implied—it was clearly impossible to get agreement on detailed plans in a four-day meeting—there was nevertheless widespread support for what came to be called the Leghorn Plan—proposed by Richard S. Leghorn, president of Itek Corp. (BW—Jul.18'59, p78), a scientist, businessman, ex-Air Force Pilot, and surveillance expert. Leghorn has been serving as chairman of the Special Project Committee on Security through Arms Control of the National Planning Association.

Leghorn said there are three basic approaches to peace. The U. S. should pursue all at the same time but was likely to achieve them only in series.

First, the U. S. would have to enforce international order through its deterrent power. This means that the U. S. must acquire an invulnerable "second-strike" power, in the language of the experts: a family of long-range missiles invulnerable to an enemy's first strike—because they are either under the sea in submarines in unknown locations, or on railroad cars touring the country, or in "hardened" underground bases. Then any nation that struck the U. S.—no matter what it did to this nation—would be certain to die itself.

U. S. efforts would be required to make it continuously clear to the Russians that we have no intention of striking first, but that we would certainly strike back against a nuclear attack with devastating effect.

The number of missiles needed for doing this job would not be enormously large—it might run in the hundreds or the low thousands. But it would have to be large enough so that no nation would be tempted into a first strike.

The least stable situation at present, Leghorn and others argued, would be for the U. S. to have no H-bombs and missiles; this would impose enormous temptations on a hostile nation to cheat and acquire a large enough atomic striking force that could be used for blackmail. Particularly if war broke out, both nations would try to get the jump on the other with nuclear arms.

A ready second-strike nuclear force would thus, in the present world, make for more, not less, stability than a zero level of nuclear arms.

Second, the U. S. should push for the development of institutions of international law. The conference, in support of Leghorn's second plank, passed a resolution urging the development of a "working system of international law, without which a permanent and just peace cannot be achieved." This implied, the group added, that the U. S. and other nations repeal "national, self-judging reservations to the optional clause of the statute of the International Court of Justice."

. . . our immediate goal is "metastability"—the stability of a sailboat . . .

Third, the U. S. should—in the long run—work for arms reduction by individual nations, and the transfer of control over arms to the United Nations.

But Leghorn and the other conferees recognized that steps two and three would be long and difficult to achieve—if they could be achieved at all—and that only the first step could be counted on immediately as a guarantee of peace. "National arms," said Leghorn, "are not an unmitigated evil; they are a precondition to world law and order, and a precondition of reduction of national armaments."

• Cost—Leghorn's plan was described by one RAND man, Amrom Katz, as an approach that represents the position of "at least 80% of the people doing advanced thinking on the arms control problem." This plan would mean that, in years immediately ahead, arms control will "cost more before it costs less."

The reason for this, as Leghorn sees it, is that invulnerable retaliatory systems cost a great deal, and so do their necessary components, information and intelligence systems. Information systems and R&D work to forestall enemy surprises in operations or in technology will be needed if the U. S. is to negotiate and carry out arms control.

• Balanced Defense—Leghorn also argued that the U. S. needs to build up highly mobile conventional forces, so that it will not have to rely on the massive-retaliation policy as a response to provocations that can be met without using atomic weapons. He and other military experts present at Arden House held that technological progress is taking us back to the World War I position, when defensive weapons had a vast edge over offensive weapons. If we aim at a more balanced defense to deter attack—one scaled to the size of the aggression—Leghorn thinks stability will be increased. Some disagree: They fear that if the U. S. suggests it's ready, willing, and able to fight conventional wars, it will soon have them.

But nobody looked for perfect stability. RAND's Katz—the star phrasemaker who thought up the "Nth-country" handle, says our goal immediately is "metastability".

This is a physicist's term which means stability like a sailboat's; a sailboat can tip to the wind and still bob up again—as long as the wind isn't strong enough to capsize it. END

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

This is to invite you to meet with a group of leaders in business and the professions over the weekend of Thursday evening, June 2 to Sunday noon, June 5, at "A Conference to Plan a Strategy For Peace." The purpose of the Conference is to discuss fresh approaches in planning U.S. policies to attain a secure and just peace.

For the past several months a number of concerned individuals and I have been discussing the continuing unresolved world problems with persons in government, business, education and science.

There appears to be general agreement that a more adequate definition of U. S. goals is needed. There also seems to be agreement that a group combining practical business experience, the knowledge of the scholar, and experience in science and government can contribute outstandingly toward defining objectives and suggesting practical means of achieving them.

I am convinced that wise decisions and recommendations needed for long-range comprehensive planning can come from the concerted efforts of people from many fields of endeavor. This Conference could perform a useful function in outlining the specifics of a long-range plan. In fact, having such a plan would in itself be a significant step toward its achievement. Our discussions might also lead to a continuing study group whose work could well be a great contribution toward resolving the serious international problems facing us.

Prominent individuals in and out of the government have encouraged the holding of this Conference. President Eisenhower in the enclosed letter has given encouragement to such a meeting as well as to the coordination of our efforts with those of his recently appointed Commission on National Goals.

It is also my conviction that the thinking citizens of our country have an inescapable responsibility for helping our government to arrive at policies and plans which may well affect the future of all human beings.

I hope you can accept this invitation to be a guest and participant at the discussions to be held at Arden House, Harriman, New York, June 2nd to 5th, 1960. Details about transportation from New York, etc. will be sent to you later. I look forward to hearing from you at your early convenience.

The suggested agenda and schedule are enclosed.

Sincerely yours,

Tom Slick

9:00 A.M.	FINAL PLENARY SESSION
	Coordinated reports of group chairmen and rapporteurs. Consideration of continuing studies and procedures directed toward development of specific proposals.
12:00	Adjournment and Lunch

(*) NOTE: It is hoped that the individual groups will develop provocative discussions leading to new ideas and new approaches to the seemingly difficult problems involved in arms control and inspection, peaceful settlement of differences between nations, and other problems related to achieving a secure and just peace.

No elaborately detailed agenda is proposed. A list of speakers, discussion chairmen and rapporteurs will be sent to you. To assure that many aspects of the problems may be covered, discussion group chairmen will initiate discussions along the lines outlined above. A list of provocative questions will be available to participants to stimuate the discussions.

WASHINGTON

July 11, 1959

Dear Mr. Slick:

I was pleased to receive your letter of June twenty-fifth informing me of progress in the development of your idea to form a private group of prominent citizens to develop a long-range, basic peace plan.

I certainly think you are to be commended for the public spirit which prompted this proposal. While we in government continuously are wrestling with this problem, a group of eminent citizens outside of government certainly could develop ideas that would be of help to us in our continual search for ways to reduce world tensions.

I am particularly happy that you have arranged to coordinate your efforts with those of the Commission on National Goals, and am sure that your activities can be mutually beneficial. I hope that you will keep us informed of further progress in your most worthy and important endeavor.

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your cordial letter of October 3rd written in behalf of Mr. Tom Reid, Chairman of the VI Annual Student Conference on National Affairs.

Many thanks for your cordial letter of September 22nd. I greatly appreciate your invitation to participate in your 1960 Conference as a "Round-Up" speaker and very much regret that I cannot accept. Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Sixth Student Conference on National Affairs (SCONA VI) Committee, Texas A & M College, invites you to participate in the 1960 Conference as a "Round-Up" speaker.

This Conference was begun six years ago with the idea of stimulating the thinking of outstanding college students in the United States, Canada, and Mexico along the lines of an understanding (and not a solution) of our mutual national and international problems.

The dates of the Conference this year are December 7, 8, 9, and 10 and the site is the Memorial Student Center on the campus of the A & M College of Texas.

Judged on past attendance we expect delegates from 60-65 colleges and universities (including the three military academies). In order to pay for housing, food, and partial transportation for these delegates and the faculty, the SCONA student committeemen hope to realize a budget of approximately $16,000. This money is acquired by means of personal calls made by these committeemen on businessmen and foundation heads in Texas, Louisiana, and Mexico. Our sponsor list numbers around 120.

The topic for SCONA VI is "The Task for the Free World: Problems and Opportunities in the 60's." The Program Agenda which we are inclosing shows the major divisions which we wish to consider under the main topic.

The core of our program is the round-table session. We will have seven round-table groups of student leaders meeting during the Conference to discuss information presented in each principal address.

SCONA operates in conjunction with the Great Issues Committee so that the audience potential is far greater than would be realized within the boundaries of the Conference alone. The Great Issues Committee, another student organization, is dedicated to presenting nationally and internationally known leaders in various fields who speak on world-wide topics. Thus, the audience for the principal speakers will be drawn from the students and faculty of the A & M College of Texas, the delegates to SCONA, and members of the Bryan-College Station communities and interested persons in the surrounding area.

Other principal speakers who have been invited include: The Hon. Horace H. Smith, Senator Thomas J. Dodd, Mr. Dudley Ctawford Sharp, Senator William Fulbright, and Dr. Vannevar Bush. Your function as Roundup Speaker would be to sum up and analyze the speeches of these men before the delegates on the final day of the conference.

We are able to offer you an honorarium of $500 and SCONA will be happy to make all arrangements for your travel and will take care of travel expenses, and of course we will provide housing and food in the Memorial Student Center. The college owned Easterwood Airport is located on our campus approximately two miles west of the Memorial Student Center and is served by Continental Airlines. Non-stop flights from Washington to Dallas or Houston take only three hours--and we will meet you in a first class, two engine plane at either city, if connections are not good, for the flight to College Station.

We can assure you of an eager audience and feel that your presence will contribute materially to the success of SCONA VI.

With all good wishes from the members of SCONA and Great Issues.

Sincerely,

Tom C. Reid

"The Power Struggle in Today's Communist World"

Daniel Schorr is best known as an outstanding correspondent and specialist on Communist affairs. With his broad world background, Mr. Schorr is considered one of America's keenest observers and most expert commentators on international crises. For several years, Chief Correspondent in Moscow for CBS, he now covers major world events from Washington, the United Nations and Eastern Europe. He comes to us directly from Poland and Yugoslavia. Mr. Schorr will give us an inside picture of the struggle for leadership and power in the Communist world . . . Poland on a tightrope . . . the rising power and impatience of Peking . . . the struggle for power within the Soviet Union. To those seeking a balanced and intelligent approach, his presentation promises to be a highlight of our series.

ROBERT KIRSCH Tuesday, February 2

"The Novel at Mid-Century"

Brilliant Book Editor of the Los Angeles Times, teacher of creative writing at UCLA and promising young American author, Robert Kirsch is in close contact with the American literary scene. An excellent speaker, his works, both fiction and non-fiction, have appeared in many national magazines. His most recent novel, "In The Wrong Rain," which was published this past summer, has achieved wide acclaim. As West Coast Editor for the McGraw-Hill Publishing Company, he has additional opportunities to observe the world of literature. Mr. Kirsch will examine the state of American fiction today as it reflects the major social and psychological issues of the present era; an examination which he is eminently well qualified to make by virtue of his dual roles as author and critic.

MARTIN LUTHER KING Tuesday, Feb. 23

"Stride Toward Freedom"

Catapulted into prominence by his enlightened leadership in the struggle for racial justice in Montgomery, Alabama, where he gave direction to the Montgomery bus strike, the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., is today recognized as one of the most courageous and intelligent spokesmen for his people. A disciple of Ghandi's philosophy of passive resistance, Dr. King is Pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery. He holds degrees from Morehouse College and Boston University, and is the recipient of many honors and citations from universities and civic groups throughout the country. In 1957, at the age of twenty-eight, he was selected by Time Magazine as one of the ten outstanding personalities of the year. A compelling and lucid orator, Dr. King will deal with the Negro's struggle for racial justice in America and self determination in Africa.

"Can a Free Society Survive?"

The Challenge to Education

Robert Maynard Hutchins is one of the world's leading educators. He has left a significant and lasting impression on American education through his influence over countless institutions and students. After an amazing career, which began with his appointment as Dean of the Yale University Law School at the age of twenty-nine, and his role as President and Chancellor of the University of Chicago for twenty-two years, he continues to occupy a vital place in American life as President of the Fund for the Republic. An exciting and provocative platform speaker, he has lectured throughout the world. Dear Mr. Cogen:

Please pardon the delay in responding to your gracious letter of June 30th. As you are aware, I have been traveling a great deal during the past few weeks.

I am indeed flattered by your proposal of the United Federation of Teachers to honor me with the 1961 John Dewey Award, and I wish very much that I could guarantee my personal appearance at the Annual Spring Luncheon Conference on Saturday, March 4, 1961 in order to accept it. Unfortunately, my radio and television commitments are such that I cannot possibly make plans for other activities so many months in advance. It may well be that coverage of international developments may demand my being out of the country next March.

I am sure you will understand the situation and realize that there is no lack of appreciation on my part for the honor that the United Federation of Teachers proposed to confer upon me. Please convey my sincere regrets to your committee.

Your gracious letter of June 30 arrived here after Mr. Murrow's departure for Los Angeles to cover the Democratic Convention. As he will go direct from there to Chicago for the Republican Convention, I do not expect him to return to New York until early August. This letter is therefore just an interim acknowledgement until Mr. Murrow can reply to your invitation himself.

Dear Captain Ragen:

Thank you for your letter of August 31st and for sending me the script. I wish very much that I might do as you ask and narrate the film entitled, ALERT IN THE PACIFIC, but the truth is that in addition to my very heavy schedule of radio and television programs, I am already so involved with narrations for the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Heart Fund, and quite a few others that there just isn't time to fit anything more in at the moment.

I am extremely sorry about this but am sure you will understand the situation. If, at sometime in the future you feel I can be of help to you, please do not hesitate to ask. If it is at all possible I shall be only too willing to help.

REPLY TO ATTN OF: OP

SUBJECT: SFP 626 "Alert in the Pacific" Film 25 August 1960

TO: Office of Information Services
Secretary of the Air Force
New York Branch
663 5th Ave
New York City, New York

(Capt Art Regan)

1. We are sending you with this letter a copy of the script for SFP 626 "Alert in the Pacific", a 14 minute film on the Pacific Air Forces along with a copy of the AFR 95-14 per Major Mark's suggestion.

2. The objective of this film is two-fold: to acquaint military personnel and civilians assigned to PACAF with the mission and organization of the command and, more important, to inform the general public of what PACAF is in our defense establishment, to indicate something of both it military and political significance.

3. In view of the proposed public release of this film through TV outlets throughout the United States, and considering the importance of the Far East and our military mission there, "Alert in the Pacific" can serve as an important public information function.

4. The selection of a narrator for this film is therefore extremely important. PACAF headquarters has recommended, and we agree with them, that the voice should be nationally known and one reflecting the prestige demanded by the subject: the disposition of our aerial strength in the Far East, the interdependence of US forces stationed there with those of our allies -- Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, the Philippines and Thailand -- and the daily routine of those men assigned to the command responsible for the aerial defense of this broad area.

5. We think this subject and this script would be most effectively narrated by Edward R. Murrow of CBS, greatly increasing its impact on the general public. And although we recognize that there may be some difficulty in getting him for this project, we think his understanding of its importance will surmount this.

6. It is therefore requested that the script be made available to Mr. Murrow and that every effort be made to convince him that he, more than anyone else, should really be its narrator.

7. You will note that scene 8 is sync sound and we would have to photograph Mr. Murrow for this scene in a New York studio or wherever he says.

8. Thank you very much for your help in this matter. Since, as always, we are eager to finish the picture, please let us know Mr. Murrow's decision as soon as practicable.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

As a member of the United States Naval Reserve Volunteer Public Relations Company for New York City, I would like to extend an invitation for you to meet with us at 5:30 p.m. on November 14th for a discussion of the 1960 Presidential Campaign and its results.

Our group is composed of more than a hundred New York area Naval Reserve Officers whose civilian jobs are in journalism, communication, and public relations. We meet every Monday evening at 90 Church Street or another convenient location to instruct our members in latest and most pertinent developments in these fields as well as the Navy.

We are pleased that you have an interest in the Navy and hope you will be able to join us November 14th. We would not look for a formal talk from you, but more a give and take bull session which you would enjoy and which would still give us your reactions to various features of the 1960 campaign and its results.

I am privileged to invite you to join the Honorary Committee which will sponsor the Ambassadors' Dinner at The Waldorf-Astoria on Tuesday May 3rd, to celebrate the opening of the United States World Trade Fair at the New York Coliseum the following day.

Mayor Wagner will be host at the dinner which will honor the top level diplomats from the sixty-five nations participating in the Fair. This occasion will afford us a magnificent opportunity to demonstrate our interest in promoting international good will. As in the past, the proceeds from the Dinner will go to a worthy cause, and the March of Dimes has been selected as this year's recipient.

Featuring more than three thousand exhibits, including uniquely interesting national pavilions, which will occupy the entire nine acres of floor space in the Coliseum, the Fair will offer an outstanding display of new and intriguing consumer and industrial goods. Members of the Honorary Committee will be invited to attend the formal opening of the Fair on May 4.

With my assurance that no obligation is involved, do let me know that I may add your name to the Honorary Committee which will be comprised of the civic, business and social leaders in the community.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Baltimore Chapter of the United World Federalists, Inc. is planning to give an award to a reporter for his outstanding work relating to the efforts for world peace. We are having our annual dinner on Tuesday, November 15, 1960 at 7:00 P.M. at the Sheraton-Belvedere Hotel. Dr. Brock Chisholm, eminent psychiatrist from Vancouver, will be the speaker. He was the first director-general of the World Health Organization, is the author of "Prescription for Survival", is Honorary President of the United World Federalists of Canada and Vice-President of the World Association of World Federalists.

We feel that this would be an appropriate occasion at which to present this award. We would like to present this award to you personally and are wondering whether you could find the time to attend this dinner. Naturally, your expenses would be paid by the United World Federalists.

May we hear from you as soon as possible as to your availability, so that we may make final plans for our program?

Dear Mr. Laporte:

Many thanks for your cordial letter of August 5th.

I am greatly pleased by the invitation extended by the University Club and am hoping that it would be possible for me to accept. However, I am deeply involved in a number of radio and television shows which do not permit me to commit myself to anything taking place in the near future. It is, in fact, impossible for me to predict at this time, when my duties will require me to be in or out of the country. If you will bear with this situation and suggest a date either in January or February and let me know how long in advance you would need definite confirmation of my availability, perhaps we can arrange something.

Many thanks again and best regards.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The University Club would like to hold a reception in your honor on a Saturday sometime during the coming winter (December, January, February or March). I am sure that our members would turn out in large numbers to hear any remarks which you might make or views you might express. All, of course, are keenly interested in television and its future. Anything that you might say on this subject would be of great interest to our members, which, as you doubtless know, include a number of leading executives and professional men.

The reception would begin about 12:30, we would sit down to lunch promptly at 1:15 and would adjourn not later than 3:00 P. M. If agreeable to you, your remarks might be followed by a short period of questions from the floor.

Last year we had as our guests on similar occasions former President Hoover, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, General Maxwell D. Taylor, Mayor Wagner and others. Thus far the only definite date we have scheduled for next season is Prime Minister Diefenbaker of Canada, who is to be our guest on December 10th.

The officers and members of the Council of the Club heartily concur in this warm invitation and we all hope that you will accept.

I am writing you rather early in the hope that you will give our invitation careful consideration and accept it in due course. We would then work out a date agreeable to you.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Although you have not accepted Mr. Pearson's invitation to the Conference on World Tensions we feel sure that you will be interested in the development of our plans. We continue to hope that you can arrange your schedule so that you may assist in the discussions which have as their goal conclusions and recommendations on practical steps which can be taken to improve present situations of tension.

A distinguished group of speakers and participants have already accepted. Six Nobel Peace Laureates will speak on the evening of May 11th. Mr. Adlai Stevenson, who is now in Latin America, has expressed his intention to attend. He has been invited to address the May 12th evening session.

A tentative program is enclosed. The final program, listing all speakers and the exact location of the sessions, and a list of participants will be sent to you in April.

Also enclosed are lists of the members of the Sub-Committees and the background papers prepared by experts in the three areas of the Conference. Rapporteurs are preparing reports and recommendations based on the background papers and the joint discussions of the Faculty Committee and Sub-Committees.

In the event that you accept the invitation you will receive a final program, background papers and information regarding hotel reservations. You will be a guest of World Brotherhood at all luncheon and dinner meetings.

We trust that you will make every effort to join in our deliberations in which you can be very helpful and which you will surely find interesting and stimulating.

We shall appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Dear Mr. Murrow:

With the concurrence of Chancellor Lawrence A. Kimpton, Dr. Arthur H. Compton, and Mr. Harry A. Bullis, I have the honor to invite you to participate in the Conference on the Reduction of World Tensions, sponsored by The University of Chicago and World Brotherhood, Inc., to be held at The University of Chicago May 11, 12, and 13th, 1960.

The need for this Conference at this critical period of history is obvious. There is growing recognition of the responsibility of private citizens and non-governmental organizations to concern themselves with current world tensions and to concert their efforts in the search for practical steps toward more wholesome relations among the various peoples and nations and more effective cooperation in improving the lot of mankind. A solid foundation of citizen responsibility, understanding, and effort is required as a support for policies which will lead us toward a more peaceful world.

We are inviting, as speakers and participants in the discussions, a group of the most able and distinguished citizens of North America, as well as of other continents, whose counsel we believe essential to the Conference in reaching constructive conclusions and in gaining the attention of the world. We hope very much that you will plan to spend the three days with us since you will undoubtedly be interested in the entire program. Please let us know which of the three major areas of the Conference is of greatest interest to you, so that we may arrange for you to give special attention to the field with which you are particularly concerned.

An outline of the Conference and schedule of the preparatory meetings are enclosed. As a participant in the May Conference you will receive the results of all Working Party discussions by mid-April. A more detailed program of the forthcoming Conference and a list of the distinguished participants will be sent you at a later date.

I hope you will reserve May 11-13th on your calendar and send me your acceptance as early as possible.

Kindest personal regards

Yours sincerely,

L B Pearson

WORLD BROTHERHOOD

Established in 1950, UNESCO HOUSE, Paris, to promote understanding and cooperation among people differing in religion, race, nation or culture.

NEW YORK - GENEVA - BOMBAY 1960

ARTHUR HOLLY COMPTON

ARTHUR HOLLY COMPTON WRITES: As World Brotherhood enters its 10th year our program is focused on the urgent global problem of waging peace. This emphasis is based on the conviction that only if existing world tensions are lessened can the necessary changes in relationships among peoples and nations of the world be made peacefully, with mutual understanding and cooperation.

Impetus in this direction was given by Mr. Paul-Henri Spaak in 1955 when he called for a high-level international meeting of minds on the question of Asia-Africa-West relationships. Consultations with leaders of thought from all continents during the next years helped to shape our plans for implementing Mr. Spaak's idea.

In 1957 World Brotherhood brought together 70 key United States organization heads to participate in its first major conference on removing roadblocks to world peace.

A major program of conferences on reducing world tensions and improving relations among peoples

The following year, at the initiative of Mr. Paul G. Hoffman, our program was given world-wide scope when our Working Party and Seminar met in Bern and issued the report, "Steps Toward Peace". Concerning this report Arthur Krock, columnist of The New York Times wrote: "The material produced by the distinguished international group in the Swiss Capital is worth a pause for earnest consideration. This is no minor stuff and these are no seminarians to dismiss as just another bunch of bleeding hearts."

Lester B. Pearson

NORTH AMERICAN PROJECT: Mr. Hoffman and I are convinced that universities which have done so much toward scientific and technological progress have an obligation to concentrate their vast intellectual resources on serious study and experimental work on questions relating to world peace. Recognizing this obligation, the Chancellor and faculty of The University of Chicago, in cooperation with World Brotherhood, have organized a program of discussions and a conference on "The Reduction of World Tensions". Under the distinguished chairmanship of the Hon. Lester B. Pearson, recipient of the 1957 Nobel Peace Prize, this series of meetings, to be attended by the most able and influential citizens of North America and by distinguished experts from abroad, will be one of the most significant and realistic efforts yet attempted to analyze conflicts of interest and tensions between the two major power blocs and between the rich and poor nations of the world, and to set in motion forces which will lead to the peaceful solution of these problems. The presence of recipients of the Nobel Peace Prize will help to draw wide public attention to the conference.

The areas to be dealt with are as follows: 1) Barriers to Communication, 2) Inequalities Between Poor and Rich Areas of the World, 3) Impediments to the Development of World Law.

ALL-INDIA CONFERENCE: Under the distinguished leadership of Dr. G. L. Mehta, former Ambassador of India to the United States, who served as Chairman of the Bern Working Party, the All-India Committee of World Brotherhood will sponsor a conference on "Democracy in India in the Asian Background," to be held in Bombay in January 1960. In addition to the participants from India, non-governmental leaders from the neighboring Southeast Asian countries and experts from Europe and North America will be present.

SEMINAR IN COOPERATION WITH THE INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATION: This meeting which has recently been discussed with David Morse, Director-General of ILO, will concentrate on the problem of "advancing the economic stages of developing countries." This seminar will consider means by which leaders in government, management, and labor groups can promote better economic and cultural development and improve interrelationships among nations and peoples.

To obtain the widest possible utilization of the basic papers, recommendations and reports of these conferences, World Brotherhood will mobilize the interest and assistance of the network of operating organizations—universities and schools, religious groups, civic agencies, labor and management groups, non-governmental international organizations, and channels of the press and radio. As was the case with the Bern meetings, this method has proven to be very effective in the creation of informed public opinion essential as support for constructive action at governmental levels.

Scientists increasingly feel their responsibility in our age of atomic energy to foster the development of spiritual and moral forces so that the evolution of better human relations may match our technological progress. World Brotherhood is the agency which I have felt could best work along these lines and I believe that the reliance I have placed on this organization over the years has been justified.

The past success of World Brotherhood and the high commendation of those quoted in this bulletin indicate that the program here outlined deserves generous financial support.

—ARTHUR HOLLY COMPTON

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER: "I believe that democratic solutions to mankind's problems require private citizens to take responsibility to study, to think, to speak, and to act. If World Brotherhood, beginning with this University of Chicago project, can carry forward a program in the coming years which will promote thoughtful discussions by the most able citizens of the United States and of other countries concerning our complex international relationships, the cause of peace—which is the cause of all nations—will be well served."

PAUL-HENRI SPAAK: "Just at this moment in history special efforts are required to forestall the development of misunderstanding and bitterness between Asians and Western peoples. While there is agreement on the ideals leading to the passing of traditional colonialism there are many political realities and economic problems which call for time, patience and good-will in the search for right solutions which may not be the same in every case. World Brotherhood, as a private organization, can create links and contribute, through frank and unofficial exchange of ideas, to a meeting of the minds of people in these crucial areas."

BARBARA WARD JACKSON: "By far the most urgent question for East and West alike is not so much to understand each other as to grasp their fateful common destiny as human beings in a community threatened by disaster. The threat is twofold—from the institution of war in the atomic age and from the turbulent social forces released by the industrial and scientific revolution. This focus of interest seems to me to be eminently correct for World Brotherhood; the greatest need is to turn its generalities into the concrete question of what we do as brothers when our neighbour falls into the ditch!"

KONRAD ADENAUER: "We live in a dangerous time, under the curse of the means of mass annihilation which threaten to imperil the existence of mankind with their destructive power. Ever more urgent becomes the demand to solve peacefully the manifold industrial, social, ideological and political problems. This requires the goodwill and the cooperation of all men. To bring influences together on a non-political plane, in order to clarify in free discussion the basic problems which concern us, is a project deserving full support. To World Brotherhood, dedicated to this problem, our most sincere appreciation is due."

VIJAYA LAKSHMI PANDIT: "Peace is in everybody's mind. But how can we move toward that great concept of peace when we have in our hearts fear of each other, suspicions of each other, prejudices against each other. Unless these are cleansed we cannot move towards peace. Peace can only follow upon world brotherhood. World brotherhood will not follow on peace."

CARLOS P. ROMULO: "The series of seminars and working parties leading up to a conference of distinguished and influential persons, to be held under the joint sponsorship of The University of Chicago and World Brotherhood, Inc. . . . carries forward the new line of development begun by World Brotherhood in the highly successful and influential conferences held in Bern, Switzerland in 1958."

JOHN COWLES: "World Brotherhood's proposed program for the next three years strikes me as excellent. Your proposed University of Chicago seminars and meetings in Europe and Bombay make complete sense to me. From what I saw of the World Brotherhood Conference at Bern, and from my subsequent talks with leaders in South Asia, I am convinced that World Brotherhood is potentially significant enough to merit the time and financial assistance of important people."

ALBERT DE SMAELE: "The world today must be regarded as a vast complex of interdependent factors, involving peace itself, as well as economic, social and cultural development. Profound changes are taking place, producing tensions which may be regarded as symptomatic of a new birth, which it is our duty to support and guide so that new values may grow up and at the same time a dynamic equilibrium be maintained between the different sections of the human community . . . The continuation and development of the work World Brotherhood started in Bern seems to be imperative."

PAUL G. HOFFMAN: "The principle underlying the World Brotherhood conferences, such as those at The University of Chicago and in Bombay, is that universities, responsible for so much technical advance including atomic chain reactions, must join with practical private citizens to explore the world's areas of tension to bring about a fusion of thought and effort and a chain reaction for peace. Unofficial persons uncommitted to rigid governmental positions can and should explore these tensions frankly and fearlessly and point the way toward practical and peaceful solutions."

HERBERT H. LEHMAN: "As a participant in the remarkable discussions at Bern a year ago, I have a special interest in the continuation of such efforts and I can speak with conviction on the value of bringing together thoughtful people from various regions to study the existing problems and tensions and point out practical measures for increased mutual understanding."

W. ARTHUR LEWIS: "I am very glad to hear that World Brotherhood is to organise a conference in Chicago on world tensions, and will give some time to the problems of the African peoples. Africa is now emerging rapidly from colonial status. Her peoples' needs are exceeded only by their potentialities. The conference will find their problems fascinating as well as significant to the future of international peace."

DR. G. L. MEHTA: "The meetings at Bern were a forum for free and frank exchange of views on the present international situation. They were useful and stimulating but the conference can only be regarded as a beginning. In these days of centralization of power, political and economic, and of overwhelmingly large-scale organizations in Western and Communist countries, we are apt to underrate the power of voluntary institutions and of common men and women who can be a strong force for peace."

ADLAI E. STEVENSON: "A hundred years ago, even fifty, perhaps even fifteen, to speak of World Brotherhood was, I suspect, to adorn with rhetoric what was at most a remote ideal. Today, however, it has become an insistent, demanding reality, thrust upon us whether we accept it or not by a science that has broken down the fences which had before separated the peoples of the world."

HIS EXCELLENCY U THANT: "I sincerely appreciate the courageous effort now being made by World Brotherhood towards the relaxation of world tensions and the establishment of international understanding which alone are the secure foundations for world brotherhood."

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO-WORLD BROTHERHOOD

CONFERENCE OUTLINE

The Reduction of World Tensions

There is general agreement that the political tensions that presently exist between the two major powers and the blocs associated with them -- the Soviet Union and the United States -- are the principal danger to world peace and that they paralyze much of the effort that could otherwise be devoted to improving the condition of mankind. These tensions have numerous sources. Many of them are inherent in the fact that the Soviet Union and the United States are the two strongest world powers. Some of them are due to a lack of understanding and communication. Some arise from the international character of the communist movement and its expansionist tendencies. Some also, occur because of the particular strategic and military posture taken by the United States and because the two blocs face each other directly--in Berlin, in Germany, in the Formosa Straits and in Korea.

Dangerous antagonisms are also developing throughout the world in the interactions of the two great centers of power as they affect the poorer peoples and nations of the world. The current efforts of the Soviet Union and the United States to weaken the position of the other and to strengthen their own in the poorer and uncommitted areas of the world are becoming a new, real threat to peace. Economic aid and technical assistance are now being used as instruments in the cold war. If present trends continue, distrust, suspicion and political tensions between the Soviet Union and the United States will be highly intensified.

However the tensions and conflicts between the two major powers are not the only sources of danger. Every nation, no matter how small or weak, has its national objectives and pride. The conflicting interests among the smaller nations or between some of the smaller nations and the major powers may not appear to be of the same significance as those between the two major powers, but they have violently explosive possibilities which could touch off a world-wide nuclear conflagration. It is necessary, therefore, to explore the varied hopes, ambitions and needs of the smaller and newer nations, the possibility for more open communication among peoples so that there may be fuller mutual understanding of these needs and the possibilities of devising economic institutions, and rules and procedures of law that would enable them to meet their needs, to improve the condition of their peoples and to live with others without disturbing the peace -- which is the greatest need of all nations.

It is not possible in the series of seminars and conferences which we plan to explore in depth all of the sources of tensions and conflicts that presently threaten world peace. We have decided to concentrate on three areas because (1) we believe them to be of primary importance, and (2) we believe that it is possible to present suggestions for solutions for some of the problems which might be acceptable to nations both large and small of the East and West. The three areas are the following:

1. Barriers to communication;

2. Inequalities between poor and rich areas of the world;

3. Inadequacies in the body of world law and in legal institutions and procedures for settling international conflicts and disputes.

A brief indication of the scope of each of the areas is given below in the outlines of the background papers.

The background papers have two major purposes: (1) to provide the necessary factual and historical background for intelligent discussion, (2) to present and analyze critically the principal alternative means of controlling tensions and creating improved relationships. It is not necessary that the authors of the background papers support any particular means or measures; the papers will be designed to focus and sharpen the discussion on the extremely difficult and complex issues involved.

Brief Outlines of Background Papers

A. Barriers to communication

Many of the tensions that exist in the world today are real in the sense that they grow out of genuine and important conflicts of interest. But other tensions result primarily from a lack of understanding of the feelings, needs, objectives and purposes of peoples and governments. Most governments of the world, some much more than others, have consciously restricted the flow of information across national boundaries and many governments have used various forms of censorship to prevent their own people from obtaining knowledge of the actions of their own and other governments or of the essential facts relating to conditions and events within their own territory or in other countries. Two background papers will be commissioned.

1. Barriers to freedom of press, radio and television.

This paper should describe the nature of the major restrictions on the free flow of ideas that now exist, perhaps by a series of case studies of four or five nations -- the United States, the Soviet Union, one in South America, one in the Middle East, and one of the new nations of Africa or Asia. The following questions might be considered: What purposes are the barriers supposed to serve? What are the principal misunderstandings and misconceptions which have been fostered by them? What possible costs or consequences would occur if the barriers were entirely removed? Are there any types of barriers required by the national interests of the various countries? Do the types of restrictions on the free flow of ideas imposed by the United States result in significant impairment of good will abroad? Should the United States unilaterally remove or reduce barriers to the flow of ideas or should it do so only on the basis of multilateral or bilateral agreement? How can other countries be encouraged or persuaded to relax restrictions on the flow of ideas and information?

2. Barriers to international contacts among scientists, scholars, business administrators, writers, tourists, and others.

The background paper on this subject would have much in common with the one above. The basic nature of the problems are similar, but additional insight may be gained by considering certain aspects of the barriers to opportunity for people to travel and learn through personal contacts and by seeing for themselves. Special emphasis will be given to the areas of science and scholarship in the humanities.

B. Inequalities Between the Poor and Rich Nations

There is no doubt that poverty, disease, ignorance and illiteracy in the poorer nations are a constant source of discontent. The poor and new nations are increasingly aware of their relative conditions and are determined to improve it. At the same time the lack of respect for the importance and dignity of the poor nations often shown by the richer nations is a psychic factor that must be regarded.

This situation offers many possibilities for violence and for breaches of the peace. Fortunately there is growing understanding on the part of rich nations that rich and poor alike will benefit from and find greater security if the poor nations are aided in improving their unhappy lot. There is even a growing willingness to admit that the motive of self-interest on the part of the strong nations can be strengthened by a sense of moral responsibility toward the weak for which no apology is needed.

While there is a wide disparity in income produced and an even greater difference in goods and services consumed per capita in the United States and in the Soviet Union, both nations may be viewed as being among the rich nations; certainly the per capita income of the Soviet Union is substantially above the average for the more than a billion citizens of the poorer nations of the world. There is a considerable degree of mutuality of interest, though far from complete, for the United States and the Soviet Union in reducing conflicts and antagonisms between the rich and the poor. Over the next two decades the security of both major powers can be affected by developments in the poorer nations. If present world developments continue, it is possible that the possession of nuclear weapons and missiles may spread to nations other than those now having such devices. Such a development would greatly increase the possibilities of an accidental, but world-wide war.

Possibly one of the most fruitful ways of reducing tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union is to start with those issues where positions have not already been firmly established. The relations with the poorer nations, at least some of them, represent such a situation. A related issue, viewed entirely from the standpoint of the interests of the United States, is that many of the poorer nations are rightly suspicious of our motives in developing foreign aid programs on the grounds that most of our aid has gone to relatively rich areas of the world and a significant fraction of the aid to poorer nations has involved military items and has been motivated by narrow and immediate strategic purposes.

Three background papers would be commissioned:

1. An examination of technical assistances, grants, loans, and trade to determine the extent to which these efforts have reduced the inequalities between poor and rich nations, which kind have proved most effective and acceptable and which have been unsatisfactory and harmful?

The purpose of this background paper will be to review the experiences of major nations, especially of the last two decades, in reducing barriers to trade and in providing technical assistance and various forms of economic aid, to indicate the mistakes and pitfalls that have become apparent and the nature of the positive achievements that have come from these efforts. The paper should attempt to identify the particular circumstances that are either favorable or unfavorable for, and to specify the relative advantages or disadvantages of -- freer trade, loans, grants, technical assistance programs, technical training efforts and programs for the education of foreign nationals abroad, and education of foreign nationals on the spot in their home lands.

2. Alternative ways and means in the economic sphere, including trade and various aid programs, for reducing the inequalities between poor and rich nations. (a) Among the alternatives the paper should examine approximately the present policies of the United States and the Soviet Union of using aid unilaterally as a means of blocking the extension of the influence of the competing major power; (b) An open competition between the United States and the Soviet Union in the provision of aid and assistance, but maintaining aid on a unilateral basis; (c) An agreement with the Soviet Union and other major Western powers to provide aid to an increasing extent on a multilateral basis; or (d) The recognition of certain areas where unilateral or bilateral agreements will have to continue to some extent because particular strategic or political interests of one of the major powers is dominant (Hungary and Albania in the case of the Soviet Union and Turkey, Korea and Formosa in the case of the United States, for example), but applying either (b) or (c) in other areas. The same for trade.

3. The aspirations and legitimate interests of new nations and colonial areas and the role the United States and the Soviet Union might play in the encouragement of their development. This paper would consider the implications of racial issues, the problems of the populations of European origin in certain areas, the possibilities of training and other measures to improve governmental administration and legislative processes, the relative appeal of various forms of economic organization in nations desiring rapid economic development, and the positive role that major countries might take to encourage and assist them in attaining the objectives to which they aspire, and to achieve genuine independence with suitable adaptions of "free" forms of government.

C. Gaps in the Rule of Law When Applied to the International Sphere.

Disputes between governments, between nationals of different countries or between the nationals of one country and the government of another country are inevitable. What is not inevitable is that there should be no mutually acceptable means of arriving at unbiased settlements of such disputes. In many areas of international commerce such methods, some formal others rather informal, have existed for centuries. But few nations are willing to submit most disputes involving tensions and distrust to the institutions that now exist for that purpose. Nor has there been any real effort in recent years to devise new institutions or codes of law that might be useful in the settlement of disputes of an international nature. It is not possible to explore all aspects of the problem of the international settlement of disputes. Nor does it seem likely at this particular stage of history that disputes between the United States and the Soviet Union can be resolved on any other basis than negotiation. What would be explored is the possibility of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with other major Western nations, delineating certain classes of disputes that would automatically be decided by due process of law if either of the parties involved so desired. The possibility might be explored of the United States agreeing to the impartial settlement of disputes between itself and a group of smaller nations whose political and economic power is substantially less.

Two background papers would be commissioned:

One possibility would be to ask two competent authorities to write papers, independently of each other, on the general issue as each sees it. Another possibility is the following:

1. The nature of the available institutions for the impartial settlement of international disputes.

While this paper would be primarily factual, it would also be interpretative in the sense that explanations would be sought for the reasons why in some kinds of disputes arbitration or adjudication has functioned successfully while in others relatively little has been accomplished.

2. The possibility of creating a "rule of law bloc".

This paper would explore the implications to the United States and other nations of agreeing to settle certain types of disputes through a system of courts. The bloc might begin with an agreement among a few nations with the possibility that other nations - as the evidence of success of legal procedures increases - might join the bloc. For example GATT began with agreements among a few, with additional countries joining the general agreement as its usefulness was demonstrated.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO-WORLD BROTHERHOOD

PROGRAM PLANS FOR SEMINARS, WORKING PARTIES, AND FINAL CONFERENCE

1. The preliminary drafts of the background papers are to be prepared by the early part of October.

2. A series of seminars based on the background papers will be held by members of the faculty of the University of Chicago during the autumn of 1959. The author of each paper will be asked to participate in at least one of the seminars. The purposes of the seminars will be to marshal the opinions and insights of interested members of our faculty, to make suggestions for revisions of the papers, and to undertake a preliminary draft of the report of the working party.*

3. Four working parties will be convened. These will meet during the months of November through February. The working parties will probably meet for two days. During this period the basic working paper(s) will be discussed and the preliminary report of the working party revised and a report drafted that will be circulated to all members of the conference. The working parties will include approximately ten members for each party. The majority of each party will be drawn from qualified persons outside the University of Chicago.

4. At least one month in advance of the conference, all invited conference participants will be supplied with the background papers and the reports of the working parties.

5. The conference will consist of two primary activities. First, there will be general sessions addressed by persons of prominence and ability whose opinions are of value in contributing to the solution of the problems posed at the conference. Second, there will be a series of seminars in which the ideas presented in the background papers and the reports of the working parties will be discussed. An effort will be made to limit the number of participants in the seminars to approximately 15-20. There would thus be two or three seminar groups discussing the area covered by each report of the working parties. There should be one meeting of all the seminar groups considering each major area at which time the members of the working party would delineate the areas of agreement and disagreement on the report of the working party.

* The responsibility for the final draft of the background paper will rest with the author. While the author will undoubtedly be influenced by the discussion, we do not expect the background paper to be a committee report in any sense of the word.

 Some of the general sessions, perhaps two, will be open to the public.

6. The reports of the working parties will not be revised at the final conference. However, the seminar groups may suggest possible additions or indicate areas of disagreement. Such points would be included in the final conference report. Similarly, the members of the conference, either individually or as a group, may indicate their reactions to the recommendations formulated by the working party.

7. The conference is tentatively planned for May 11, 12, 13.

8. The number of invited participants to the conference, in addition to the members of the working parties and those members of the University of Chicago faculty who have participated in the faculty seminars, should probably be limited to 100. This would give us a total participation of about 150, which seems to be as large a number as we can adequately manage if we are to limit the seminar groups to 15-20 members each.

Dear Miss Daughenbaugh:

Many thanks for your letter of November 1st.

I greatly appreciate your invitation to speak at the University of Colorado and very much regret that I cannot accept. My radio and television commitments for the next few months are such that I have had to decide to devote myself to that side of my work and not undertake to make any speeches no matter how tempting the occasion.

Thank you again for asking me.

Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Ave.
New York, New York

Dear Sir:

Students at the University of Michigan, in response to the need for comprehension of and involvement in the basic and crucial issues of our time, have organized a program called CHALLENGE. The modern world challenges us with more vast and serious problems than ever before; and we, as students and citizens, have not developed the ability to understand these problems. CHALLENGE is our attempt to fill this void by bringing to the campus men actively involved in major issues to join students and faculty in discussion and analysis. Through this program we can form opinions on which to base our future actions. We can gain a greater sense of urgency from men who regard these problems as issues demanding personal commitment.

CHALLENGE deals with one major topic each semester. This fall, such speakers as Harold Taylor, Paul Blanshard, Henry Steele Commager, and Norman Thomas have helped us to face "The CHALLENGE of American Civil Liberties." Faculty and outside resource people supplemented their efforts in smaller seminars.

This spring, we will confront "The CHALLENGE of the Emerging Nations." We must understand the problems faced by these nations and we must intelligently analyze the effect, on them, of U.S. foreign policy. If we are to act effectively in a world in which these countries will play an increasingly important role, we must begin to understand them now.

A major speech on "The Breakdown of Colonialism and the Formation of a National Consciousness" will pose this CHALLENGE early in February. For the next nine weeks, we will study and discuss the nature of the developments and changes initiated by the emergence of underdeveloped nations. The CHALLENGE COLLOQUIUM WEEKEND, April 21 to 23, will explore the effects of present U.S. policies toward these nations, discuss possible adjustments of these policies, and attempt to indicate roles which the U.S. student can play in meeting this CHALLENGE. (A tentative program is enclosed.)

The Friday evening colloquium speaker should present an overview of developments and changes within the emerging nations and should state the problems faced by the U.S. in formulating policies toward these nations in the light of these developments and changes.

We ask you to present the keynote address for the colloquium weekend. This would be on Friday evening, April 21. Your presentation would be followed by active discussion and debate. You will be expected, within the limits of your stay in Ann Arbor, to meet informally with other student and faculty groups. If you are interested, but prefer to approach a different problem or to meet with us at another time, we will try to arrange this.

We hope that you will help us to produce an exciting and informative program. An early response would be appreciated, so that we may make formal financial (and other) arrangements.

Sincerely,

Brian Glick

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

CHALLENGE

THE IDEA. . .

The modern world challenges us with problems more vast and serious then any this nation has ever faced. Nuclear power, mass industrialized societies, underdeveloped areas, scientific technology, the welfare state, racial and national tensions all have created problems so far-reaching and so explosive that they pose inescapable dangers to our civilization. Men all over the world are struggling to control these new forces before they are overcome by them. And the very possibility of control, equally new in history, makes it all the more imperative that we fully understand them.

We feel that we, as students and citizens, have not developed the ability to comprehend these issues. As we move into adulthood in the modern world, the responsibility for the solution of its problems will fall on our shoulders, yet we feel peculiarly unprepared to accept it. Students, more than anyone else, should be engaged in gaining a realistic understanding of their environment, yet we are not rising to this challenge. We find that many of us simply do not care about the problems of our world. And even those of us who do find that our university environment is fragmenting and intellectualizing our concern and sensitivity to the point where we cannot respond creatively to today's most pressing issues. We need a program to help us explore these issues with unity, depth and vigor. CHALLENGE is our attempt at Michigan to fill this void. Its goals are the creation of a widespread awareness of major contemporary problems and the encouragement of an active response to them.

THE PROGRAM

To attain these goals, CHALLENGE will sponsor a program of critical discussion and debate focussed on one major issue each semester. The topic for the fall semester will be THE CHALLENGE OF AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES. Possible topics for succeeding semesters are

The Challenge of Underdeveloped Nations

The Challenge of Scientific Technology

The Challenge of the Welfare State

The Challenge of the Nuclear Age

The discussion and debate will take several forms:

1. CHALLENGE will bring to the campus to present their views prominent men who are actively involved in the major issues. These men do not consider the problems as academic questions, but as issues demanding personal involvement, and their experience will convey to students a sense of immediacy and importance. In each semester, there will be a series of major speeches, leading up a Colloquium Weekend. At the Colloquium, three or four more major speakers will bring the discussion to its culmination. These speeches will be given in the large campus auditoriums, open to the public.

2. Supplementing the major speeches will be a series of smaller discussion groups in the living units and other key areas on the campus. Led by faculty members, these seminars will provide background information and allow the student to present his own views.

CHALLENGE will be a community program. It will co-operate with other student and faculty groups on the campus to encourage discussion, and to channel interested students into constructive, responsible action. Residents of Ann Arbor and the surrounding area will be invited to attend the major speeches, and CHALLENGE will work with interested church and civic groups to set up seminar discussions. Eventually, nearby colleges and universities will be encouraged to attend the presentations and initiate their own CHALLENGE programs. CHALLENGE will attempt to unite the diverse elements of the university and its community on a topic of national interest and concern.

In all of these presentations CHALLENGE itself, like its parent group at Yale University, will be independent. It is not concerned with taking a stand on any issue. It will attempt to present the complete spectrum of opinion on all controversial issues, in order to stimulate students to form opinions of their own.

c/o C.B.S.
485 Madison Avenue
New York City, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

In the past years on our campus, the International Affairs Committee of the Michigan Union has sponsored an All-Campus United Nations. The program consists of a mock United Nations General Assembly with each delegation composed of American and foreign students which meets and debates issues of current international importance. These issues are selected by a Security Council composed of foreign students assisted by the University's Political Science Department.

This program has three major objectives:

1) To furnish the foreign student an opportunity to represent his country in debate and discussion;

2) To make the American student more aware of the cosmopolitan community of which he is a part and to foster in him a desire to broaden himself intellectually through international contacts; and

3) To create occasions for both of these groups of students to fulfill these desires.

Since Michigan has the largest foreign student enrollment of any American university (1700 students from 80 countries), we feel that we can expand this program to better realize our goals. This expansion will mean an entire week of activities sponsored jointly by the Michigan Union, the Michigan League, the Student Government Council, the Inter-House Council, and the Inter-Fraternity Council. The week will start March 13, 1960, and lead up to the final meeting of the mock General Assembly, Saturday evening March 19.

Highlighting the week's activities will be an address on Saturday evening by someone active in the field of international affairs. It is for this reason that we have written you. Your vast knowledge and work in international journalism would certainly make you a most fitting speaker at this occasion. The cooperating organizations and the student body of the University of Michigan would be honored to have you as our highlight speaker of this important week. We hope you can consider accepting this invitation.

The subjects we would hope you would consider for topics are:

1) The United Nations' role in the problem of atomic energy
2) The Future of the United Nations
3) World Disarmament

Of course, any suggestions you may have will certainly be helpful in planning our program for that evening and the arrangements for a specific topic need not be made until later.

Because of planning and scheduling technicalities, we would appreciate your reply before the twentieth of this month.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On the University of Utah campus during the week of November 13 to 19, members of all the Greek-letter societies will be conducting a variety of activities centering around the importance in contemporary life of news gathering and news communication.

We are writing to invite you to be the major speaker for the banquet on November 18, which climaxes the week's events. Our funds are not limitless--though our aspirations are. Might it be possible for you to be in Salt Lake City to deliver a thirty to forty minute talk to an audience of 1000 or more students and faculty? We will pay full expenses for the trip and for hotel and meal expenses. We can also offer a fee of $500.

Even though the monetary inducement may not be great, perhaps you might consider this an exploitation opportunity for building audience interest among intermountain viewers. The University student group numbers 25,000, and we could promise thorough publicity coverage of this number. Also, through the University Public Relations Office, we could arrange state-wide newspaper coverage of the event.

You could expect a very enjoyable time here. Mountain resorts are within twenty-five minutes of Salt Lake, and there may even be snow for skiing. Also, there are a number of places of interest nearby which would extend a visitor's acquaintance with this part of the country. We are enclosing a booklet containing information about the University of Utah.

I hope we may hear favorably from you regarding this invitation.

Very truly yours,

Suzanne Forsberg

UTAH'S GROWING CAMPUS

A 485-acre campus—bounded on the east by the Wasatch mountain range and on the west by the capital city of the state of Utah—is the home of the University of Utah, the first state university west of the Missouri River.

A five-minute drive from the western edge of the campus takes you into downtown Salt Lake City and the cultural opportunities, fine shops, professional sports events, and the stimulating industrial and business climate of this urban center of the mountain west.

A five-minute drive from the eastern edge of the campus takes you into the invigorating outdoors of the canyon valleys. Summer and winter the striking beauties of nature and a variety of exhilarating sports await your enjoyment.

The George Thomas Library. One of the two largest university libraries in the mountain west. Outstanding for its excellent reference collections.

1) Kingsbury Hall. Home of the Theatre Arts Department, the University Theatre, the Theatre Ballet and the Children's Theatre.

2) The Park Building. University administration headquarters.

3) The lower campus at change-of-class time.

4) The Engineering Center. Phase one of this project is now completed and in use. Final completion of the entire center, which will house all departments of the University's outstanding State College of Engineering, is scheduled for 1965.

5) Block "U" on the Wasatch foothills. In a freshman ceremonial each fall the "U" gets a fresh coat of whitewash, and every spring the whole campus joins in a pilgrimage to this University landmark.

6) The Playbox. Experimental theatre workshop.

THE ACADEMIC PROGRAM:

the opportunity to seek knowledge

The greatest opportunity offered students at the University of Utah is experience in the enjoyment of learning. All the other benefits of university life — the companionship, group experiences, leadership opportunities, service opportunities, are carefully planned into the program — but the emphasis is on education.

On any day of the University school year, 1800 to 2000 classes are in session, under the direction of an active teaching faculty of 800 members, nearly 50 per cent of whom hold doctoral degrees. The various fully accredited colleges in which students may program their studies and the degrees which may be earned at the University of Utah are indications of the extent of the academic program.

Learning by doing combines with classroom instruction and individual study in the University program. Constantly-improving facilities and equipment create new opportunities for putting theories into practice.

2) One of the two University-owned mobile weather stations used by students in the department of meteorology. When this photo was made, weather studies on the shore of the Great Salt Lake were in progress.

The Vickers Microscope. Typical of fine precision instruments in use at the University is the Vickers Projection Microscope, which is equipped with all accessories for seeing and photographing microscopic-size particles and surfaces. Projects presently utilizing this instrument include a study of the growth of ice crystals on foreign nuclei, a very important process in meteorology; and a wide-scale study of solid state physics — in particular the effect of imperfections in the structure of crystals on their properties.

Some students live in the University residence halls on campus. 1) Carlson Hall is one of the women's halls. 2) Ballif Hall is one of the residence halls for men. Many students are married — about 20 per cent. For this group, new campus housing is being built (3). A great number of University of Utah students who come from the Salt Lake area live at home with their families. Some students live in the fraternity and sorority houses.

STUDENT LIFE

As diverse as the student body itself—which draws its members not only from all counties of the state of Utah, from every state of the Union, but from more than 50 foreign countries — is the social and personal life of University of Utah students. This fact adds an important dimension to student life on this campus. From a wide range of activities, associations, friendships, interests and cultural pursuits, students train themselves in the important discipline of making choices—electing to do those things which will make the university experience a meaningful, enjoyable, personal experience.

Leadership in student activities comes, as it should, from the students themselves.

The officers of the Associated Students of the University of Utah (ASUU) manage student government and appoint the various committees which plan and carry out the important and colorful events which highlight the campus calendar.

RELIGION

In recent years a reviving intellectual interest in religion has penetrated into many phases of American life. At the University of Utah religion can be an integral vital part of student life. Although there is no tie between the University and any religious group, religious organizations of many faiths are closely allied to the campus to serve students' spiritual needs.

1) The Latter-day Saints Institute of Religion. 2) Student Christian Fellowship House. 3) The Newman Club for Catholic students. 4) Home of Hillel Councilorship for Jewish students. 5) Home of the Unitarian Channing Club. 6) Home of the Episcopal Canterbury Club.

FINE ARTS

Cultivating enjoyment of the fine arts is one of the special pleasures and opportunities of student life at the University of Utah. University students are active members of a variety of highly-regarded performing organizations.

These groups present many music, drama and dance performances which attract enthusiastic public audiences. The variety of presentations ranges from Shakespearean plays, classical symphonies and ballet performances to modern dance and popular drama and comedy.

The Utah Symphony Orchestra (many of whose members are students) and the combined University of Utah choruses in a presentation of "Judas Maccabeus."

ATHLETICS

Under one of the finest college coaching staffs, Utah's nationally-known varsity teams are top contenders for Skyline Conference titles in a variety of sports. And varsity sports are only part of the athletic program at the University; an extensive intramural program offers active participation opportunities to all students.

Choose Your Sport:
Football, Basketball, Baseball, Track, Tennis, Swimming, Wrestling, Skiing, Boxing and Golf — on the University's own golf course.

MILITARY TRAINING

in all three of the service branches is available at the University. Four-year ROTC programs in air science, military science and tactics, and naval science lead to commissioned officer status in the various services.

MILITARY TRAINING

The University of Utah is one of 52 universities and colleges in the United States designated by the Navy Department to offer officer training in the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps. In the Navy's Regular program the Navy provides uniforms, pays tuition, costs of textbooks and other fees, plus retainer pay of $50 per month for a period not to exceed four years. In the Contract program the Navy provides unifoms, Naval Science textbooks, plus a retainer fee of $27 per month during the junior and senior years. Upon graduation and successful completion of Naval Science requirements, candidates are eligible for appointment as commissioned officers in the United States Navy or United States Marine Corps.

STUDENT SERVICES

The general welfare of University of Utah students is the concern of skilled staffs:

The Health Service offers complete medical care to all students. Its staff of specialists is available for diagnostic examination and consultation. In addition to the thorough entrance examination, the health service provides free immunization shots for many diseases as well as polio immunization shots at a small charge.

At the Counseling Center, students may avail themselves of testing and guidance services to help them in their school activities and to give direction to their vocational plans.

The Placement Bureau assists the more than 50 per cent of university students who hold part-time or full-time jobs while they are in school, and has an outstanding record for placing University graduates in excellent positions.

HOW TO APPLY FOR ADMISSION:

1) Submit a written application to the Registrar;
2) Furnish two official copies of your high school records;
3) Complete the entrance tests.

Application forms may be obtained from the Registrar's Office of the University, and from principals of Utah high schools.

It is important that applications be submitted before the deadline which is usually the third Monday in August. Applications for admission received after the deadline may require special action.

Notice of acceptance, along with instructions for registration will be mailed to candidates for admissions in July or August.

TUITION:

Tuition at the University of Utah is approximately $250 per year for residents of Utah. The non-resident fee amounts to about $430. There are additional costs for books and supplies, and for room and board for those who do not live at home.

At University residence halls, seven-day-a-week room and board costs approximately $625 for the full nine-month school year. Off-campus housing will vary in cost from $20-$30 a month for a room without kitchen privileges to $40-$70 a month for a two or three room furnished apartment.

Stadium Village, the married student housing center, assigns single room or one and two bedroom apartments according to the size of the family. Rent for the apartments varies from $25 to $33 a month, with heat and hot water provided.

SCHOLARSHIPS:

A number of scholarships are available, primarily for Utah residents, including full tuition grants for students of exceptional ability. Scholarships are granted on the basis of need and merit.

Dear Mr. Brier:

Many thanks for your gracious letter of November 30th.

I greatly appreciate your kind invitation to speak at the All-Coast Press Clinic on February 24th and very much regret that I cannot accept. The fact is that my radio and television commitments for the coming year are such that I have had to decide to devote myself to that side of my work and not undertake to make any speeches no matter how tempting the occasion.

Thank you again for asking me.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Howard M. Brier, Administrative Assistant

Dear Miss Mullen:

This letter is a follow-up to our telephone conversation of Wednesday regarding the possibility of Mr. Murrow speaking at the All-Coast Press Clinic, February 24, 1961.

I realize that with such a busy schedule it might be impossible for us to have him as a speaker, but this is written in the slim hope that he can make it.

Our conference is held on the University of Washington campus. More than 1300 high school editors and their advisers will be here from the eleven western states. We would like like to have Mr. Murrow as our headline speaker at the banquet to be held in the main ballroom of the Student Union Building.

We could pay for a first-class jet flight from New York and return, plus a hotel suite and meals during his stay in Seattle.

Enclosed is a copy of our program for last February at which time Erle Stanley Gardner was our principal speaker. It may give Mr. Murrow an idea of the scope of the Press Clinic.

Thank you for being so gracious in taking this matter up with Mr. Murrow.

Yours most sincerely,

Howard M. Brier

1960 ALL-COAST PRESS CLINIC

Seattle, Washington
February 19, 20

The faculty of the School of Communications welcomes you to the campus of the University of Washington for the only coast-wide conference of high school journalists being held in the West.

This meeting is the Thirteenth Annual All-Coast Press Clinic held under the sponsorship of the Pacific Slope School Press, a regional association of high school newspapers in the nine western states. More than 570 school newspapers now belong to PSSP, and the number increases each year.

"Working With Words" is the theme of this convention. We trust that you will benefit from the exchange of ideas with student journalists from other states, and that you will participate in the discussions and find inspiration from the large selection of speakers.

BANQUET SPEAKER

Erle Stanley Gardner

Recently the Wall Street Journal said of Erle Stanley Gardner "Like General Motors' 41 millionth Chevrolet or RCA's 10 millionth TV set, another enterprise, famous in its own right, will pass an important milestone this week with the publication of Erle Stanley Gardner's 100th mystery novel."

Mr. Gardner, headline speaker for the 1960 All-Coast Press Clinic banquet, is one of the world's most prolific authors. At the present time he is producing an average of four mystery novels a year, creating five Perry Mason radio programs each week, supervising a Perry Mason comic strip, and preparing scripts for Perry Mason TV shows. United States and Canadian readers have paid more than $40 million for some 110 million Gardner volumes.

Mr. Gardner, who lives on his 3,000 acre ranch, near Temecula, California, keeps six secretaries busy transcribing his fiction from recording machines.

When Mr. Gardner's friends ask him to slow down and take it easy, he says, "Who wants it easy. If you're a man you want new projects. If you run out of work, you run out of life."

CLASSIFICATION FOR SECTIONAL MEETINGS

Dear Miss Lynn and Mr. Nafziger:

Many thanks for your gracious letter of November 2nd.

I greatly appreciate your invitation to participate in your 1961 symposium on "Ethics in Our Time" and very much regret that I cannot accept. My radio and television commitments for the next few months are such that I have had to decide to devote myself to that side of my work and not undertake any extra-curricular activities no matter how tempting the occasion.

Thank you again for asking me.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

The University of Wisconsin Student Association, in response to the great success of last year's program, is again presenting a symposium series. The Symposium theme this year will be "Ethics in Our Time," which will be developed in a series of lectures, debates, and discussions during the week of February 8-14, 1961.

It is our highest hope that you will be able to appear in our series as a final night commentator on the vast panorama of ethics. We are arranging for what we consider an outstanding series of eminent speakers, and we feel there is a real need for a man of your ability and interests to tie the program together.

We have received the encouraging news from Mr. Edward P. Morgan, a speaker at our first series last February, that he is sure you "would also be interested" and hopes that you will be able to attend the series. Let us first introduce background, purpose, structure and challenge of our forthcoming series.

Last year the University of Wisconsin joined in the trend set by Yale University and the University of North Carolina to bring a group of prominent men in order to further acquaint the university community with the ideas and ideals of our age. To the modern educational field, the symposium is a new means of presenting the vital issues and problems facing us; but to the general field of education, it is as old as learning itself.

As in ancient times, so now it offers a means of confronting students with the challenges of our complex world.

The criticism has often been leveled at our generation that we are too little concerned with today's problems and conflicts. Whether or not this is a justified criticism, we are attempting to bring these issues to our attention. Last year, our first symposium was held with the theme of "The Challenge of the Sixties." This year, we hope to make explicit one of these challenges--the subject of ethics. Here, more than usual, our postwar generation is scored for its failures. We are challenged to approach the highest existing code of ethics or to create a new set of standards of our own; but much of this revolves in the realm of generality. The symposium is a means of taking this out of the general and into the specific--philosophy, law, religion, business, foreign policy, and others.

We stand at a point where we must make a decision as to our path into the future, and this decision will commit us irrevocably to one course. At this point, we are buffeted with the ideas of past and present, but never with enough or with a sufficient variety. The ethical concepts upon which our society is based are important determinants of this decision for the future. In helping us to better comprehend these determining concepts, we feel your wisdom to be invaluable.

One of the speakers last February in speaking on "The Challenge of the Sixties" suggested that "we are in the beginning of a wonderful adventure," a statement that reflects our opinion toward the program of "Ethics in Our Time." Last year, we presented such men as Lord Clement Atlee, Norman Thomas, Norman Cousins, William Buckley, as well as, Edward P. Morgan. This, we feel, was a beginning and indeed an outstanding one, but merely a beginning.

We are taking the initiative, then, to again examine and challenge the ideas of great minds on ethics. Consequently, we repeat our earnest wish that you consider the possibility of attending the 1961 University of Wisconsin Symposium to speak on the philosophy of ethics. We look forward to discussing transportation, time schedule, and honorarium in future correspondence if you feel that there is a possibility of your appearing. Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Mary Carmen Lynn James Nafziger

The Union Forum Committee of the University of Wisconsin would like again to extend an invitation to you to address the student body of the university at some convenient time during the 1960-61 school year. We have written you in the past and are hoping you will be able to accept our invitation at this time.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Upon the nomination of the College of Education and with the approval of the University Council of Deans I am writing to tell you that you have been selected to receive the annual Education Citation given each year by Wayne State University. Once before you were nominated for this citation but, I believe you were unable to come to Detroit to receive it. The date proposed for the awarding of this citation is April 20, 1961.

This annual citation will be the seventh made "in acknowledgment of militant leadership in advancing education in America." Earlier recipients of the award have been Roy E. Larsen (1954-55), Chairman of the National Citizens Commission for the Public Schools; Agnes E. Meyer (1955-56), author and lecturer; Norman Cousins (1956-57), Editor of The Saturday Review; John L.Childs (1957-58), Professor-emeritus of Teachers College, Columbia University; James B. Conant (1958-59), former president of Harvard University and author of the recent study of American high schools; and Ralph Bunche (1959-60), undersecretary of the United Nations. With the citation goes a suitable honorarium and coverage of all expenses incidental to your coming to Detroit.

The theme for the 1960-61 Education Day has not been finally determined but it may be "Design for the Future" or some such general theme. A series of convocations on the theme will be held at intervals during the academic year. Last year these were addressed by Dr. Fritz Redl, Dr. Victor Loewenfeld, Dr. Robert Maynard Hutchins, and Dr. Harold Taylor culminating with The Education Day address by Dr. Ralph Bunche. Some such series will be concluded next Spring, by you, if you accept this invitation to receive the 1960-61 Education

Citation. On April 20, 1961 a new two and a quarter million dollar College of Education Building will be dedicated, and, on the evening of that day, the citation will be presented to you at a public meeting the major feature of which would be the address which you might wish to give in response to this recognition.

It is our hope that you will accept our invitation to receive this award for 1960-61 and that April 20 will be a convenient date for you to come to Detroit. Your outstanding contribution through helping Americans come to terms with crucial issues and through introducing the American people to key world figures has been most significant. This invitation has the wholehearted endorsement of the University Administration, the Council of Deans, and the faculty of the College of Education which initiated it.

If, as we hope, you are able to accept this invitation, further details of arrangements will be presented by a representative of the College faculty.

Very sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On Saturday, September 14, 1960, the Cleveland affiliate of the American Civil Liberties Union will celebrate the fortieth (40th) anniversary of its founding, by co-sponsoring with Western Reserve University a one day institute on our campus.

The central theme of the conference might be expressed as 'roadblocks to the right to know.' The University is of course very concerned about the degree of success which attends the efforts of all the media of communication to bring to the citizen the information he must have today in order to survive, and in order for our free institutions to survive.

I would like to emphasize, here, that we are interested in the responsibilities of all the media--not just television. We are interested just as much in the degree of public responsibility displayed by newspapers and radio, magazines and periodicals, or publishers, as television. We feel the problems are multifarious, involving criteria and processes of selection as well as the desirability or undesirability of governmental regulation. (For example, economic tendencies are tending to create 'one-newspaper cities.' Does this situation ask for some regulatory safeguards to prevent the silencing of opposition voices?)

Because of our concern with all media, the conference, in its afternoon sessions, will deal with questions involving printed media, electronic media, and the witholding of information to them by government agencies. We are striving for a balanced program.

Knowing of your own contributions to thinking about these problems, I would like to extend to you an invitation to make the major address on the morning of the 17th.

Would you please advise me as soon as possible whether you would find it congenial to participate in the institute?

Since I have no idea as to your usual fee for such an engagement, I would appreciate this information, too, if you are interested in speaking to our institute.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Thank you so much for your gracious letter of January 27th inviting Mr. Murrow to participate in the White House Conference on Children and Youth to be held in Washington March 27 - April 2.

I regret very much that since Mr. Murrow is on a year's leave of absence and will be traveling abroad for most of the next six months, it will not be possible for him to accept. Thank you again for asking him.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Because of your standing in your profession and in the nation, it is our hope that you personally will be able to attend the White House Conference on Children and Youth as an official participant. We are writing to explore this possibility with you before a formal invitation is issued to you in the name of the President of the United States.

As you know, President Eisenhower has called the Golden Anniversary White House Conference on Children and Youth to be held in Washington, D. C., March 27 - April 2. Its purpose: "to promote opportunities for children and youth to realize their full potential for a creative life in freedom and dignity." Seven thousand persons will participate to review the unmet needs of children and youth and to recommend citizen action in finding solutions.

The President's National Committee for the Conference is most eager to have responsible persons from the mass communications field take part in the discussions and policy-making recommendations of the Conference. This is not to be confused with coverage of the Conference, which is being developed as a separate matter.

Will you kindly let us know at the earliest possible moment whether a Presidential invitation to attend the Conference may be addressed to you.

Sincerely,

Virginia Jacobsen

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON CHILDREN and YOUTH

". . . for a creative life in freedom and dignity"

MARCH 27-APRIL 2, 1960

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE CALL TO ACTION

"Every ten years during this century there has been a White House Conference concerned with the Nation's children and youth. . . . These conferences have contributed much to our present recognition of the importance of children and youth and their full development to our national future.

"A new decade will soon begin, and I am, therefore, directing that a sixth White House Conference on Children and Youth be held in March 1960. The rapidly changing times in which we live, and the increasingly fast pace of change, make it incumbent upon us to do everything we can to plan ahead and to see that we prepare today's children well for life in tomorrow's world. . . ."

Dwight D. Eisenhower

WHAT IT'S ABOUT

The Golden Anniversary Conference, to be held in Washington, D. C., March 27 to April 2, 1960, has been called "the greatest single undertaking of our time in behalf of our young people."

Its purpose—"to promote opportunities for children and youth to realize their full potential for a creative life in freedom and dignity."

Its focus—on the effects of our rapidly changing world on the development of our young . . . on appraising and reappraising the values and ideals we live by . . . on studying the factors that influence individual fulfillment—family, religion, education, health, community life.

Right now, several million citizens, plus private and public agencies at local, state, and national levels, are at work preparing for the Conference. The pre-Conference materials they are developing during the year before the Washington meetings, plus the plans for carrying out the recommendations in the decade that follows, point up this significant fact—

The Golden Anniversary White House Conference on Children and Youth is a process rather than six days of meetings—an eleven year process of earnest study and action that continues until the next Conference in 1970.

The 1960 Conference, bringing together some 7,000 delegates on invitation of the President, will provide the rallying point—the springboard for a concerted attack on virtually every question that affects the well-being of the next generation and hope for a more rewarding tomorrow. For this reason, it is truly a total approach to the total concerns of young people.

HOW IT BEGAN

In 1908 James West and Theodore Dreiser called on President Theodore Roosevelt to discuss the plight of orphaned children. So impressed was the President that on Christmas Day he personally addressed 217 invitations requesting people from all over the Nation to attend a White House Conference in January of 1909.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED

This first Conference gave impetus to the establishment of the United States Children's Bureau in 1912, the enactment of child labor laws, and the organization of the first national voluntary agency concerned with the welfare of children. In each decade that followed, a White House Conference on children and youth called by the President left its mark—

1919—Established national responsibility in setting minimum health and welfare standards for mothers and children.

1930—Produced the most comprehensive collection of data on the health and welfare of children ever assembled, including the Children's Charter.

1940—Led to strengthening of personnel and training standards in equipping American children "for the successful practice of democracy."

1950—Endorsed a platform for meeting the problems which prevent young people from achieving healthy personalities; developed machinery for continuing activity during the time between Conferences.

HOW IT IS ORGANIZED

The National Committee of 92 distinguished citizens appointed by President Eisenhower has been organized into major committees on Conference studies, interpretation, organization and arrangements, finance and follow-up.

Joined for Action—

A National Council of State Committees, representing governor-appointed committees from 50 states, three island territories, the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

A Council of National Organizations representing about 500 voluntary groups and . . .

An Interdepartmental Committee on Children and Youth representing 34 agencies of the Federal Government.

It's a Citizens' Conference—

"This Conference will be run by the people of the United States, acting through their local, state and national organizations in cooperation with the National Committee. . . . This is the only way that such a conference can truly reflect the desires and aspirations of the American people for the children and youth of this country." Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

WHO WILL ATTEND

Invitations to the White House Conference in Washington will be issued by the President on recommendation of the Committee on Invitations and Credentials. The Conference participants will include nominees of State Committees and national organizations. Also attending will be 700 young people, national leaders and 500 international guests.

HOW IT IS FINANCED

The financing will be derived in major part from the citizenry through grants from foundations and contributions by organizations, industry and individuals. . . . with the Federal Government providing funds in the budget of the Children's Bureau, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, for basic organization.

HOW YOU CAN PARTICIPATE

—Urge local and state groups to which you belong to inform themselves about the Golden Anniversary White House Conference.

—Attend meetings that are being held in the pre-Conference period to discuss problems of children and youth.

—Join in programs relating to children and youth that are under the sponsorship of your State Committee.

—Act to improve services in your community and state to meet the needs of children and youth.

—Write to your State Committee on Children and Youth to learn how you can participate in other ways.

Every citizen has a vital stake in the future well-being of our young people. That's why it's a citizens' conference—why it's YOURS for a more rewarding tomorrow.

Dear Mr. Glass:

Thank you for your recent letter and kind invitation. I very much regret that I am unable to be present on April 27th to accept the citation of merit of the William and Mary Chapter of Pi Delta Epsilon. Please do not regard this as any lack of appreciation on my part. The fact is that I have finally had to decide whether to devote my time and energies to my work in radio and television or to accept invitations to many pleasant occasions.

Again my thanks and sincere regrets.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I tried to see you in Los Angeles: couldn't; tried to see you in Chicago: couldn't; tried to call you in Pauling: unlisted number. Finally, in desperation last week I went up to your office and spoke to Miss Campbell.

Here is the story: every year the William and Mary Chapter of Pi Delta Epsilon, the national honorary collegiate journalism fraternity presents a citation of merit to the person who we feel has made an outstanding contribution to journalism to include newspapers, periodicals, radio, and television. The recepient this year was Hugh R. Haynie. This year you were our first choice, and knowing how busy you are we wanted to give you ample notice. The award will be presented on April 27, 1961 at the annual Honors Convocation.

Acceptance would necessitate appearing in person to be presented with the award and attending a banquet in your honor that evening. No speech will be necessary unless, of course, you should choose to make one. Since the 27th is on a Thursday, you and Mrs. Murrow would perhaps care to spend a day or two in Williamsburg as did the Haynies.

Alas! Miss Campbell explained you are very busy and do not plan ahead more than a week except on a tentative basis. This is a great personal disappointment to me since I have been a great admirer of yours since the doleful McCarthy days and would consider it to be an honor and pleasure to be able to bestow our citation upon you as small token of the esteem in which I and millions of others hold you.

Furthermore, I recently received a letter from the President of the College, Dr. Paschall, asking me to make an appointment with him to discuss how Operation EDMURROW progressed over the summer. He also is an admirer of yours.

I hate to face him empty-handed. Naturally, I would like to be able to present a fait accompli. Nevertheless, would you therefore, sir, kindly consider this. If you find it utterly impossible to accept our citation this year would you please write me an acknowledgement that you did consider our offer? I trust that luck will start running my way and I will get to meet you personally.

Hoping for the best, I am,

Sincerely yours

Michael A. Glass,
President
PI DELTA EPSILON

P.S. I told a fairly white lie to your secretary: thinking that if I told her that I was a lecturer at the College instead of a lowly student, it would be more impressive, I told her thus. Actually, I will be lecturing in conjunction with the Honors work I am doing in Political Science. Having often been asked what grade I'm in, I wasn't even the slightest bit offended by the various sceptical glances. I must say everyone was most polite especially Miss Campbell.

Mr. Murrow was in the office very briefly at the end of last week and asked me to send you his reply to your very kind invitation, as he himself is away from New York this week.

Unfortunately, he has had to make a blanket ruling against accepting any speaking engagements, however attractive they may be, because of the pressure and uncertainty of his CBS commitments. He is most appreciative of your invitation and much regrets that he cannot accept it.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As you will note from the date on the enclosed letter, I wrote it earlier, but waited until the political conventions were over before transmitting the request of the Woman's Club of Williamsburg to you.

In company with many other Williamsburg friends, I enjoyed your comments during the recent conventions, as I have enjoyed your TV and radio appearances for a number of years.

I sincerely hope that you will give the request of my club your serious consideration, and I trust that you will not think us too presumptuous in our hope that you might come to Williamsburg and speak under the auspices of the club.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Realizing the great demands on your time and admitting candidly that our speakers' budget is practically non-existent (some $50 to be used for our year's programs), nevertheless, the Woman's Club of Williamsburg is requesting that you consider the possibility of coming to Williamsburg sometime during the presidential campaign under the sponsorship of the club's Americanism and Public Affairs Committee.

Our club has a membership of seventy community-minded, busy, young-in-spirit (average age-late thirties and forties), voting women, and is affiliated with the Virginia Federation of Women's Clubs, a part of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. We aremt a social organization, our purpose being "to unite through voluntary service the women of Williamsburg for the promotion of their common interest in the community welfare and philanthropic projects."

In 1952, because of the intense interest shown in the presidential campaign, our club sponsored a political panel discussion composed of representatives of each political party and moderated by George Passage, then news commentator for radio station WRVA (then affiliated with CBS) in Richmond. This program was highly successful, and we felt that we did a real service to the Williamsburg community by presenting it.

Since this campaign of 1960 promises to be one of the most exciting ones of our generation, our committee would again like to present a worthwhile program. We have been thinking again of a panel with someone of your capabilities moderating the discussion. However, if we should be fortunate enough to secure someone like you, the panel itself would not be necessary, I don't believe, since your presentation of basic issues would, in itself, be sufficient.

As, of course, you know, Williamsburg is a good cross-section of all shades of political opinion, with people of every background and geographical area represented, and I'm sure speaking before an audience here would be a stimulating experience. If you could come to Williamsburg in late September or early October, our club would be greatly honored. We cannot pay a speaker's fee, but you would be wined, dined and housed in the best Williamsburg manner, and we promise you an enjoyable visit.

If you are unable to consider our request, we would appreciate your suggestions as to someone among your colleagues who might be able to speak in Williamsburg. We will appreciate your consideration and any suggestions you may be able to give us as to a suitable type of political program which would be of most value to the community.

Sincerely,

Ada Stuart Holland

Dear Ed:

You will recall a couple of years ago my coming to your office inviting you to Spartanburg to make a talk. At that time you were so obligated that you could not consider the invitation.

I am wondering if your situation has changed. I'll tell you the reason why. On February 17th WSPA celebrates its 30th anniversary, being the oldest radio station in South Carolina. The philosophy which has guided this station is very much like your own, and that is that radio as well as TV must recognize at all times its obligation to the public and make a maximum contribution in keeping the people informed on the issues of the day.

I can think of no one whom I would rather have here speak to our anniversary banquet than yourself. Coming down here and rubbing shoulders with some of the people in our area, it would seem to me, would be in keeping with your sabbatical leave. No doubt, you have some arrangement with a speakers bureau or a manager and, of course, we would pay whatever honorarium and expense would be involved.

Won't you give this serious consideration and let me hear from you at your earliest convenience. I am sure you can appreciate the fact that time is of the essence.

Alaska Hails Newest Methodist University

This $1.3 million building is the first AMU academic structure to go up. It will house facilities for more than 400 students and will include administrative offices.

Alaska Methodist University

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

Anchorage, Alaska

To All the Friends of Alaska Methodist University:

It is with eager anticipation that we all look forward to the opening of the doors of Alaska Methodist University this fall. September 30, 1960 will represent the culmination of ten years of planning on the part of countless hundreds of individuals and groups.

It is time to express appreciation to all the individuals who have had a part in bringing into being the Alaska Methodist University. With all the unfinished tasks before us, it is also time to request wholehearted support in every way, moral, financial and otherwise, from all our friends.

The most important single phase of Alaska Methodist University will probably be discussed the least. I should like to point out that we feel that all our efforts, plans and dreams are focused toward one goal: what is to happen in the classroom and laboratories. We feel that buildings, endowments, administration, library, programs, all are directed toward the impact within the classroom between competent faculty members and eager students and scholars. This, to us, is of central and continuing importance.

Our goal is to secure an outstanding faculty with unusual teaching competence to assure the academic excellence which is so necessary to the life of an institution such as ours. We believe that the citizens of Alaska will be well pleased with the faculty, curriculum, library provisions, and other elements which make up the Alaska Methodist University program.

It is our hope and dream that the Alaska Methodist University will take its place among the great universities of our Nation. With your continued prayers and dreams and activities, we shall all be assured of achieving the goals we have set before us.

Cordially yours,

Fred McGinnis

THE UNIVERSITY IS A PROJECT OF THE DIVISION OF NATIONAL MISSIONS OF THE METHODIST CHURCH

A great Methodist institution will open its doors on September 30.

Alaska Methodist University is all ready for the first wave of the 500 students it expects to have enrolled by 1963; and has been hailed by civic and education leaders throughout the new state. President Eisenhower extended his congratulations to President Fred McGinnis, as did Alaska's Gov. William A. Egan, honorary chairman of a $1 million fund drive for AMU dormitories and faculty houses.

The mayor of Anchorage urged the city's residents to support the university as a "forward movement" and "this most welcome opportunity for our youth."

AMU will be worth $15 million within five years, predicts Business Manager W. L. Dunsworth.

Facilities of the university include an academic building for 400 students, with 14 classrooms, six laboratories, cafeteria and administrative offices; a dormitory accommodating 96 students with five faculty apartments; a library of over 15,000 volumes and a maintenance building. It will be a four-year, degree-granting, church-related liberal arts college.

Admission forms are available through the dean's office, Box 4-517, Anchorage.

Tuition is $750 for the year; housing in the dormitory $250 yearly. Food costs can only be estimated at about $600 for the school year. The only other expense is that for textbooks. Scholarships will be granted on the basis of need and academic excellence. Student loans and "grants in aid" are available and work opportunities will be made possible.

Alaska Methodist University has been granted the services of an official consultant by the Northwest Accrediting Association and also by The Methodist Church's University Senate.

PLANNING THE UNIVERSITY

THE ADMINISTRATORS

Mr. McGinnis

Dr. Heller

In December of 1959, the Rev. Fred McGinnis was elected as acting president of AMU; and to the permanent position of president in April of 1960.

He is a native of Atlanta, Ga., attended Asbury College and Candler School of Theology, then earned the B.D. degree at Asbury Theological Seminary. He served at Quincy, Ohio, until 1950 when he was appointed to the Methodist church at Juneau, Alaska. During this time he also was the chaplain of Alaska's Senate for two sessions. In 1954 he came to First Methodist Church, Anchorage, and from 1955 to 1957 served as Alaska superintendent. He was then appointed full-time resident superintendent for the entire state. In 1959 he was elected president of the Alaska Council of Churches.

The choice for a capable dean of the new university has fallen of Dr. Herbert L. Heller, a Presbyterian, and native of New Castle, Ind. He comes to that position from DePauw University, where he was associate professor of education.

Dr. Heller attended Indiana University, and Ball State Teachers College, going back to Indiana U. to earn his Ed.D. degree in 1952. He did undergraduate work at James Millikan University and the University of Alaska. He taught for a time in Indiana high schools, and during 1947 was registrar of Hanover College in Indiana. He taught summer sessions at Ohio University, North Texas State College, University of New Mexico, and University of Alaska.

Dr. Heller has membership in a number of educational societies, and in Kiwanis International. He served three years in the U. S. Naval Reserve as an electronics officer, with overseas duty in the South Pacific. He holds the rank of lieutenant commander.

THE ACADEMIC COUNCIL

The academic and advisory council which will serve AMU consists of: Seated, Chancelor Chester Alter, Denver University; Dr. Frederick Smith, Southern Methodist University; and standing, l. to r., Dr. Charles Emrich, Emory University, Dr. Myron Wicke, Southwestern University, and Dr. Eric Faigle, Syracuse University.

Transfer of Credits

Transfer of credit arrangements have been worked out with the following institutions:

University of Alaska, Fairbanks
University of Puget Sound, Tacoma
Willamette University, Salem
College of the Pacific, Stockton

Alaska Methodist University feels that students may transfer credits to a large number of other institutions of higher learning, based on academic records, should the need or desire arise.

Approved for Veterans

In order to make possible the enrollment of veterans of the Korean War, approval was sought of the State of Alaska Department of Education. This approval was granted to veterans enrolling under Public Law No. 550 and action is pending for enrollment of veterans under Public Law No. 894 and the War Orphans Educational Assistance Act of 1956.

AMU to Have a Distinguished Faculty

In addition to competence, preparation, understanding and acceptance to AMU's basic goals, the two criteria used in choosing the members of its faculty included: (1) Balance between age and youth, between those holding Ph.D.'s and M.A.'s, balance within the three major areas of learning, the humanities, social and natural sciences, and mathematics, and balance in teaching experience. (2) Personality traits, including friendliness, tolerance, understanding of student problems, democracy in attitude, community participation, cultural involvements, cooperation, Christian ideals and standards.

Dr. Charles P. Beall, who earned his Ph.D. at Indiana University, will fill the post of professor of political science. He is 36, and majored in that subject at DePauw University in 1943-48. He earned his M.A. at Indiana U. and at the University of Stockholm in 1948-49.

Dr. Beall had experience in YMCA work in Fort Wayne, Indiana, and later was an instructor at Indiana University; from 1952-60 he was an associate professor at University of Wyoming.

The new professor of mathematics is Dr. Wayne Dancer, 62, who attended University of Toledo, Ohio State University where he earned his M.A., the University of Wisconsin and University of Michigan, which awarded him the Ph.D. He taught mathematics at the University of Toledo and University of Wisconsin.

The scholastic preparation of Dr. Leonard Freese, 54, AMU professor of biology, included a B.A. and M.A. from the University of Colorado, and Ph.D. from Northwestern. He has taught in public schools in Kansas, Texas Military College, National College of Education, Evanston, Ill., University of Houston, and Jesse Jones High School in Houston.

Robert Frederick, 32, associate professor of history, has a Ph.D. pending at Indiana University, and took his earlier training at Hanover College in Indiana, and Indiana University.

He was research assistant and student counselor at Indiana from 1950-51, and was in the office of the dean of students at Texas Technological College for the next two years. He taught history from 1953-56 at the Naval Academy Preparatory School, Bainbridge, Md.

Named to the post of associate professor of music is Dr. Charles Murray North, 34, former director at Anchorage School of Music. He attended Whitman College, University of Denver, Northwestern University, Chicago Musical College, Eastman School of Music, and the University of Rochester. Dr. North holds the B.S. in zoology and chemistry, and the B.M., M.M., and A.M.D. degrees in music. He taught from 1954-57 at Eastman School of Music, and 1957-58 at Anchorage Community College.

Also awaiting the awarding of a Ph.D. is Ross G. Schaff, AMU assistant professor of geology. He graduated from Wyoming Seminary Preparatory School and earned the B.A. and M.A. at Boston University, where he is completing his Ph.D. work.

Mr. Schaff has been teaching at Boston in the geology department.

William E. McMahon, associate professor of literature, attended Southwestern Louisiana Institute, Tulane, and Hendrix College, from which he graduated with honors. He earned his M.A. at University of Chicago, and did graduate work at Perkins School of Theology. He held teaching positions since 1953 with Memphis State University, Arkansas State College, and the College of the Ozarks as head of the English Department.

The new instructor in sociology and anthropology, Miss Nancy Yaw, is a candidate for the Ph.D. at University of Washington. She is 24, and attended Lewis and Clark College and University of the Philippines. She earned her M.A. at University of Chicago.

Radio and theater experience has helped to prepare Frank Brink, assistant professor of speech, for his post. He is 44, and attended Maryville College in Tennessee, University of North Carolina, and Montana University.

He had a teaching fellowship at U. of North Carolina in 1941-42, and was program director of KFQD (1945-46) and KENI in Alaska (1948-51). Later he joined the Alaska Community Theater, and in 1954 joined the faculty of Anchorage Community College.

The associate professor of religion and chaplain at AMU is the Rev. Richard Gay, 40. He attended Ursinus College in Pennsylvania, Drew University, and the University of Pittsburgh, and Franklin College of Law. Mr. Gay has held pastorates in Pennsylvania, and was a high-school principal in public schools there from 1944-45. From 1946-50 he was minister of Pittsburgh's First Methodist Church, and from 1950-60 has been at Ohio Wesleyan University.

Melvin O. Kohler, adjunct-associate professor of art, is 48, and was in the interior decorating business in Anchorage when appointed to the AMU faculty. His schooling was at University of Washington, California School of Fine Arts, and Columbia University. He has taught at College of Puget Sound, at Columbia, at Berkley Institute, New York, and Anchorage Community College.

James Parsons, adjunct-assistant professor of psychology, has completed all but his thesis for the doctoral degree at Columbia University. He earned his M.A. at Columbia and at University of Minnesota. He has taught at Pacific Union College, Ozark Academy, University of Minnesota; was clinical psychologist at Harding Sanitarium in Ohio, and from 1953-59 at Alaska's Department of Health and Welfare.

Mrs. Matson

Miss Ethridge

Miss Carroll

Miss Ellridge

Mr. Bantz

Mrs. Steinauer

Four Named to AMU Staff

Among the able staff members who will serve the new Alaska Methodist University is Mrs. Willetta B. Matsen, librarian. She is a native of Montana. Her husband Robert is an engineer with the Federal Aeronautics Administration; and their daughter, Carolyn, attends Lewis and Clark College in Portland, Oreg.

Mrs. Matson has a degree in library administration from the University of Montana, and she worked for the university for 11 years. In 1945-46 she set up the Anchorage Public Library from a private collection, and for eight years headed the library in biological and medical sciences at the Arctic Health Research Center.

She will have as her assistants Mrs. Billie Ethridge and Miss Elizabeth Carroll. Mrs. Ethridge is a native of Oklahoma but spent most of her life in Texas before coming to Alaska in 1959 with her brother and sister. Her husband, Harry, died in 1955.

She attended Lee College in Tennessee, majoring in Christian education, and graduated from Bartlesville Business College in Oklahoma.

She has been secretary with the Cities Service Oil Company and to the city engineer of El Paso, Texas. She also was a supervisor with Southwestern Bell Telephone Company.

Miss Carroll hails from Gloucester, Mass., and attended Trinity College, Washington, D.C., and Regis and Simmons Colleges in Massachusetts. She worked in the public library at Providence, R.I., and was head librarian for two years in Gloucester. She has worked as an Army and as an Air Force librarian, in the Far East and Alaska. She is "proving up" on a homestead, and commutes to AMU each day.

Another Oklahoman is Mrs. Elinor Ellridge, secretary to AMU President McGinnis. She attended the University of Iowa and University of Kansas, and during the war worked for the Northwest Service Command in Whitehorse, Yukon Terr., as a teletype operator and stenographer. She was court librarian and secretary for five years for Judge J. L. McCarrey, Jr., of the U. S. District Court in Anchorage.

Business Manager a Texan

A Minneapolis-born Texan is W. L. Dunsworth, taking over as business manager at Alaska Methodist. He is 39, and his education has been at the Universities of Minnesota and Kentucky. He was business manager from 1948 to 1959 at Midwestern University in Texas, and before that was the school's instructor in business management and business manager for its vocational program.

Mr. Dunsworth

In 1942, Mr. Dunsworth became medical administrative officer in the U. S. Army, stationed at Shepherd AFB, remaining until 1946.

Mrs. Willard A. Steinauer, more often known as Peggie, now serving as administrative assistant to AMU President McGinnis in public relations and fund raising, was AMU's first office secretary in 1954. She then became office manager for the 1955 fund drive, was later appointed executive secretary, then secretary to the president.

Mrs. Steinauer has been in Alaska 12 years, is married, and has eight grandchildren. Her husband is with Northern Consolidated Airlines, and is a well-known guide to Alaska's hunting and fishing areas.

AMU Credits Accepted in Leading Universities

In order to effect the acceptance of credits of Alaska Methodist University by other institutions for the purpose of securing a teacher's license, letters were directed to several west-coast state departments of education.

The Department of Education of the state of California replied that "the acceptance of credits of students from Alaska Methodist University by the University of Alaska would suffice."

General arrangements have been effected, in addition, and for specific programs, with:

University of California
University of Southern California
Northwestern University, Graduate School of Medicine
Stanford University, Graduate School of Medicine.

Mrs. Matson and her staff prepare the AMU library for the influx of students this fall. A number of reference books were made possible by the men of the Oregon Annual Conference.

Wells

This dormitory, built at cost of $700,000, is set for completion on September 30, 1960. It houses 96 students and four apartments for members of the AMU faculty; service areas, and lounges.

ALASKA METHODIST UNIVERSITY

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

Alaska Methodist University is founded initially as a Liberal Arts College with a Christian environment. The doors of this new, higher educational institution opened for its first students on September 29, 1960.

Our aim at Alaska Methodist University is to provide an opportunity for students, who are willing and able to try, to achieve a college education. The university is liberal in that the attempt is made to free the mind of prejudice, provincialism, bias, conformity and conservatism through intelligent and enlightened search for the truth.

The curriculum is designed to help students to read understandingly, to speak and write articulately, to achieve social maturity and physical development, to think logically and to study and work independently.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

My predecessor as CED's Chairman, The Honorable J. D. Zellerbach, has accepted our invitation to make his first public address after his tour of duty as United States Ambassador to Italy in conjunction with the meeting of the CED Research and Policy Committee on February 9.

I should be pleased if you could be our guest at luncheon on that date to hear Mr. Zellerbach talk on "Defects in the Western Alliance." As the title suggests, he is prepared to give us a frank appraisal of the current state of relationships among the Western powers and of the policy problems which confront us.

CORDIALLY INVITE YOU

NINTH ANNUAL PRESIDENTIAL PRAYER BREAKFAST

FOR

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
THE VICE-PRESIDENT
MEMBERS OF THE CABINET AND OTHER NATIONAL LEADERS

ON

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY NINTH, 1961
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

MAYFLOWER HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE FAVOUR OF A REPLY IS REQUESTED BY JANUARY 30
PRESIDENTIAL BREAKFAST
INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP
1013 DUPONT CIRCLE BUILDING
WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

The United States of America began and has prospered on faith in God. The Bible has been and is the foundation for this faith; because of this, enlightenment, purpose, hope, mutual trust and cooperation have been evidenced.

The Breakfast Groups began in the early 30's by a group of business executives and subsequently included leaders from various spheres of influence. They began in order to foster faith as based on the facts revealed in the Bible, verified in history and substantiated in experience. From this early beginning these groups spread into a national movement and are now in thirty-three countries of the world.

In 1947 the movement became known as the International Christian Leadership, having been incorporated in order to increase the total effectiveness of the individual groups. As other countries adopted the concept, the national groups were linked together in a cooperative effort under the auspices of International Council for Christian Leadership. A world conference is held biannually and a national conference is held annually as part of the global program of the organization.

The Presidential Prayer Breakfast, which is part of the annual conference, was inaugurated as a time when we seek divine guidance for our national leadership, re-affirm our faith and re-assert our positions as Christians. This breakfast draws together men and women from across our nation who recognize that Jesus Christ is the Way, the Truth and the Life and that all human history will one day be consummate in Him.

Simultaneous with the Presidential Prayer Breakfast a similar breakfast has been planned for the governors and state leadership in each capitol city of the United States. These breakfasts are being planned by local committees who feel that such an event will help to draw our nation back to the faith upon which it was originally founded.

Dear Mr. Urofsky:

Please pardon the delay in answering your gracious letter of December 16th. The increased activity engendered by the numerous year-end programs and some additional traveling caused me to fall behind with my correspondence.

I greatly appreciate your kind invitation to address the Columbia student body on the challenges to be met in the field of mass communications in the next generation, and I regret to have to decline. It has been my unhappy task to be forced to choose between making speeches and participating in discussions or fulfilling my radio and television commitments. I am therefore unable to accept any invitations to speak, no matter how attractive the ocdasion may be.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The purpose of the Citizenship Council is to acquaint the Columbia student with the responsibilities he will assume after leaving the College. To further this end we are presenting a speakers program entitled "The Prospects of Our Generation."

We are inviting prominent men in key fields to address the student body about what the next twenty-five years hold in store. These are not to be vocational talks; rather, they will outline some of the problems and trends which will be the major issues confronting our generation of graduating college students.

We do not want this to be just another speakers program. In conjunction with each speech, the Council is co-ordinating a series of small group discussions both before and after the main talk--in fraternity houses, general seminars, dormitories and at teas.

Before the main talk, the speaker will meet with a small group of selected faculty and student leaders, who will serve as discussion leaders in a general coffee hour to take place immediately after the talk.

We believe that a very challenging problem exists in the area of mass communications, and how the media will respond to the demands and needs of a mass society. You have been a constant critic of the mass media, asserting that they were not fulfilling their obligations to the public. At the same time, your programs have shown what can be done when talent and resources are combined.

We would like to extend to you an invitation to address the Columbia student body on the challenges to be met in the field of mass communications in the next generation. If you would be kind enough to accept, please let me know as soon as possible, and I will send you a list of alternate dates to choose from. I am sorry that my first letter to you was never delivered, but I hope that you will be able to accept this one.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

We are writing to you in behalf of the people of our community. They have asked us time and again to try and have you speak to us at one of our Forum programs.

Our Forum series is the most successful one in the Chicago area, and we would like very much to have you in our next series, which could be any Tuesday evening during the months of November and December 1961, or January, February or March,1962.

Please let us know, if such arrangements can be made, and if so what the fee would be.

We can assure you, Mr. Murrow, that you would have an audience of fourteen hundred people and that you would be in a series with very fine artists and speakers. For this purpose, we are enclosing a brochure of this season's series.

We notice you will be in Chicago for the Council of Foreign Relations luncheon on Tuesday, January 10,1961. The writer shall be at that luncheon. If you would like me to see you at that time, or to get in touch with you while you are in Chicago, I shall be most happy to do so. In that case, please let us know by return air mail. Thank you.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Yaltah Menuhin and Joel Ryce would be very happy indeed if you could attend the Grishman-Ryce Duo recital on Tuesday evening, February 28, in Carnegie Recital Hall. Please let me know if you are free to do so and I shall be delighted to have tickets sent to you.

As you can see from the Washington reviews of their American debut last season, these young Americans still in their twenties, are already in a class with the great Francescatti and Casadesus! They should be playing to a sold-out big Carnegie Hall, instead of the little hall, and I know you need only hear them to agree that they merit all the recognition and honor their own country can give them. I am sending the information to Shelby Smith in Washington in hope that the concert will be covered by the U.S.I.A., as the Duo has won the highest acclaim throughout Europe and the Far East, and any news of them in their native land would be of interest overseas.

Yaltah and Joel are making their American debut in four-hand piano under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association on March 10, and I think this, too, should be covered by U.S.I.A. Wouldn't it be a fine thing if these two eminently gifted young artists were invited to give a concert in the White House? I should certainly welcome any suggestions you can make as to how to go about proposing this.

May I take this occasion to add my own small voice to the millions everywhere who rejoice in your appointment to head the U.S.I.A.? It is high on the list of events in the first few weeks of the new administration that is bringing a new and unprecedented faith and hope for the future of the American dream - particularly with regard to that most valuable of all natural resources, the incredibly rich and vital (and as yet untapped) resource of talent in the fine arts.

I do hope you will be able to hear the Grishman-Ryce Duo, and I look forward to hearing from you.

Most sincerely,

Esther Brown

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been requested by the officials of the International Television Festival of Montreux, Switzerland, to take up with you the question of your participation on their contest jury which will be judging television film entries submitted by networks from some thirty-five nations.

The contest is one part of a Festival which includes a Trade Fair showing television equipment and a technical and scientific symposium on developments in the television industry. The contest is endorsed by the European Broadcasting Union and among the jurors now committed and being contacted are Maurice Chevalier, Noel Coward and Maria Schell.

In holding discussions regarding the participation of the American networks, I have been in touch with the Columbia Broadcasting System and know that they are still considering which shows they expect to present. It is the opinion of the Festival authorities that your stature in the field of American television as well as your knowledge of the international scene would allow you to render a fair and impartial judgment. The jury is being asked to pass on the telegenic merits of shows which will be shown to them in private. I am enclosing a booklet on the rules and regulations governing the competition which should explain in greater detail what will be under consideration.

As the American representative for the Festival, I would greatly wish the opportunity to discuss this matter with you at your convenience. I shall ask my secretary to call you after the first of the year to arrange an appointment.

Very sincerely,

Albert Mark

Art. 5

Le jury n'examine que les œuvres accompagnées d'une attestation écrite par laquelle l'organisme déclare - sous réserve de son droit moral et dans le but exclusif de permettre la diffusion de son œuvre en TV par tous les organismes participant au Prix de la « Rose d'or » de Montreux - autoriser lesdits organismes

a) à procéder aux traductions nécessaires et aux adaptations indispensables de l'œuvre

b) à réaliser les copies nécessaires de l'œuvre par des instruments servant à la reproduction mécanique des sons et des images en vue de deux émissions sur l'ensemble du réseau de télévision du dit organisme.

Chacune de ces émissions donne lieu au paiement, par l'organisme qui la diffuse, des droits d'auteur usuels dans son pays pour les œuvres du même genre, sans qu'un quelconque supplément de rémunération soit versé du fait qu'il s'agit d'une œuvre primée.

Dans l'attestation visée ci-dessus, l'organisme doit, en outre, soit déclarer qu'il est, en ce qui concerne l'œuvre qu'il soumet, le seul titulaire du droit de traduction, d'adaptation, de reproduction et de télévision, soit indiquer le ou les titulaires de l'un ou l'autre de ces droits. Dans ce dernier cas, l'organisme de télévision saisi de l'œuvre exigera de l'auteur, comme condition de la présentation de l'œuvre au jury, des attestations analogues à celles visées à l'alinéa précédent, délivrées par lesdits titulaires.

c) L'organisme participant au concours indiquera également s'il y a lieu de payer une rémunération spéciale aux artistes ou interprètes et autres ayants droit pour les émissions prévues sous b.

Art. 6

Le jury comprend 7 membres dont 2 seront choisis par la ville de Montreux et 5 par la SSR, qui tient compte dans son choix d'une répartition géographique équitable.

Art. 7

Au cours de leur première réunion, les membres du jury élisent leur président. Pour le reste, ils s'organisent librement.

Art. 8

Le jury ne délibère valablement que si cinq de ses membres au moins sont présents. La SSR, d'entente avec la ville de Montreux, pourvoira, si nécessaire, au remplacement des membres empêchés d'assister aux délibérations.

Art. 9

L'ordre de présentation des œuvres est établi par tirage au sort. Les séances du jury ont lieu à huis-clos et le vote, au bulletin secret. Le président du jury organise les travaux.

Il est seul compétent pour communiquer les décisions.

Les décisions sont prises à la majorité des votants. Le président prend part au vote, avec voix prépondérante.

Art. 10

Le jury décerne trois prix:

Premier prix: La « Rose d'or » de Montreux, accompagnée d'un montant en espèces de fr. s. 10 000.-.

Les deuxième et troisième prix sont attribués sous forme de « Roses d'argent et de bronze ». Le classement ex-aequo est exclu. Si le premier prix n'est pas décerné, le jury peut répartir le montant en espèces entre les deuxième et troisième prix.

Les prix sont attribués aux organismes de télévision.

Art. 11

Pour l'attribution des prix, le jury tient compte des valeurs télégéniques des œuvres présentées.

Art. 12

Les décisions du jury sont sans appel.

Art. 13

Les œuvres sont présentées simultanément au jury, et, sur circuit spécial, à la presse professionnelle accréditée auprès des organisateurs du concours. Les organismes participant au concours garantissent que les présentations susmentionnées ne sont soumises à aucun droit d'auteur ou autre indemnité.

Art. 14

Le fait de soumettre une œuvre au jury implique l'acceptation du présent règlement.

Art. 15

L'organisation du concours et la préparation des séances du jury sont confiées à un secrétariat désigné par la ville de Montreux.

Art. 16

Le présent règlement est rédigé en langues française, anglaise et allemande. Le texte français fait foi.

Art. 2

The contest is open to television networks only.

Art. 3

Each network can submit two productions only, free of commercials. Viewing time should not be less than 15 minutes and not exceed 60 minutes. Entries must be the actual production of the participating network or the work of a producer especially commissioned by the participating network.

Art. 4

All productions must include:

a) two recordings of the entry

b) twelve copies
- — of the script in its original language
- — of the translated script in English or French
- — explanatory notes on the entry and its producers

The recording must include:

The image, sound track and international sound, recorded as per the following systems:

35 COMOPT film image of 35 mm plus a visual sound track
16 COMOPT film image of 16 mm plus a visual sound track

16 SEPMAG film image of 16 mm plus a magnetic sound track on separate 16 mm film
16 COMMAG film image of 16 mm plus a magnetic sound track

Reproduction on magnetic band ⟨Videograph⟩ recorded with 625 lines.

Art. 5

The jury will only consider entries that are accompanied by a written declaration from the participating network, stating that — under provision of its rights and with the exclusive aim of permitting the telecasting through television of its entry by all organisations participating in the "Golden Rose" of Montreux — it authorises said organisations:

a) to undertake all necessary translations and indispensable adaptations of entry.

b) to prepare all required copies of the entry by means of mechanical reproduction of sound and image, necessary for two telecasts over the entire television network of the said organisation.

For each of these telecasts, the acquiring organisation will pay copyright dues usual to his own country, without additional payment falling due, owing to the fact that it is the object of an award.

Moreover in the above declaration, the participating network must declare that it has obtained sole rights to translation, adaptation, reproduction and television of the entry it is submitting, or indicate the holder or holders of any or all of these rights. In the latter case the participating network will demand from the producer, as a prerequisite for the entry presentation to the jury, declarations similar to those mentioned in the previous paragraph, obtained from said copyright holders.

c) The organisation participating in the contest will also indicate, whether any special payments are due to artists, and others involved in the telecasts foreseen under para. b.

Art. 6

The jury will comprise seven members as follows: two will be chosen by the city of Montreux and the remaining five by the S.S.R. taking geographical considerations into account.

Art. 7

The jury will elect their president during their first meeting. They will organise themselves freely for the remaining tasks.

Art. 8

Die Beschlüsse werden mit der Mehrheit der Abstimmenden gefasst. Der Präsident fällt bei der Abstimmung den Stichentscheid.

Art. 10

Das Preisgericht verleiht drei Preise:

1. Preis: Die «Goldene Rose» von Montreux mit einem zusätzlichen Geldbetrag von 10 000 Schweizerfranken.

Der 2. und der 3. Preis werden als Rosen in Silber und Bronze verliehen. Es dürfen keine Konkurrenten im gleichen Rang prämiiert werden. Wenn der erste Preis nicht verliehen wird, kann die Jury den Geldbetrag zwischen dem 2. und 3. Preis aufteilen. Die Preise werden den Fernsehorganisationen verliehen.

Art. 11

Bei der Verleihung der Preise stellt das Preisgericht die telegenen Werte der vorgeführten Werke in Rechnung.

Art. 12

Die Beschlüsse des Preisgerichts sind unwiderruflich.

Art. 13

Die Werke werden gleichzeitig dem Preisgericht und, über eine besondere Leitung, der bei den Organisatoren des Wettbewerbs akkreditierten Fach-presse vorgeführt. Die am Wettbewerb teilnehmenden Organisationen bürgen dafür, dass für die oben erwähnten Vorführungen kein Urheberrecht oder andere Entschädigungen zu entrichten sind.

Art. 14

Die Uebergabe eines Werkes an das Preisgericht verpflichtet zur Annahme des vorliegenden Reglements.

Art. 15

Die Organisation des Wettbewerbs und die Vorbereitung der Sitzungen des Preisgerichts werden von der Stadt Montreux einem dafür bezeichneten Sekretariat anvertraut.

Art. 16

Das vorliegende Reglement ist in französischer, englischer und deutscher Sprache verfasst. Massgebend ist der französische Text.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Joint Veterans Council, comprising the American Legion, Disabled American Veterans, Catholic War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Jewish War Veterans, are holding their 10th Annual Brotherhood Breakfast on Sunday Morning, February 19, 1961, at 10:00 A.M., at the Hotel St. George in Brooklyn.

As Secretary of the Joint Council, I wish to extend an invitation to you to be our keynote speaker at this important event. Each year we have had a complete sellout at this function and I feel that the message which you will have for us that day will be most welcome by all.

Previous speakers who honored us with their presence were former Governor of New York State Averell Harriman, Senator Jacob K. Javits, Senator Irving M. Ives, and others.

Since time is short, I would greatly appreciate it if you would let me know by return mail if we can count on your being with us that morning.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Our university committee on concerts and some of our professors have requested that I extend an invitation to you to speak on our lecture series Tuesday, February 14 or Monday, February 13. We are vitally interested in having a talk on the state of the nation, which would be an analysis of our present situation with the changes in our national government.

It is the policy of the university to select men of outstanding accomplishments to speak on current events, for example, we will have a talk by Mr. Wernher von Braun on May 4, on "Why We Must Conquer Space". Our university is distinctive in that it has more educational projects over the world than any other American university.

We hope you will be able to take time from your busy schedule to visit our campus and that one of the two dates on which our auditorium is available might fit your schedule satisfactorily.

In case you are available I would appreciate information concerning the honorarium expected. We sincerely hope you can fit us into your schedule.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You are cordially invited to join a select group of fifty prominent Americans at a luncheon reception, Monday, February 20th, 12 Noon, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, to commemorate the birthday of George Washington.

This event will have dual significance in that it also will mark the 16th anniversary of the liberation of Manila and Corregidor in the Philippine Islands in World War II.

To celebrate this important milestone in American history, the Morris Morgenstern Foundation will present to Generals Douglas MacArthur and Carlos P. Romulo its "Soldier for Freedom" award, in recognition of their gallant efforts in advancing the cause of freedom throughout the world.

On display at the luncheon will be the original George Washington 1790 letter against bigotry. Mr. Morris Morgenstern, owner of this historic document, will make the awards presentation to Generals MacArthur and Romulo.

Mr. Morgenstern hopes that you will be able to be his guest at this stirring tribute to these outstanding fighters for freedom. We are enclosing a reply card for your convenience.

We look forward to your most early reply.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Director of USIA
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Congratulations upon your new appointment! So many of us will now have assurance that our story will be told honestly and effectively and I know that you will be making a major contribution.

And now a call for help--Leonard Bernstein who is our New York Brotherhood Week Chairman has informed us most regretfully that he will not be able to preside at our annual New York Brotherhood Dinner at the Hotel Roosevelt on Thursday, February 16. Could you possibly honor us by being the chairman on this occasion? I know that it is disgracefully short notice but your new appointment would make your role at the dinner even more appropriate since this is the event at which we present our annual awards to the Mass Media for the contributions which they have made to brotherhood.

Your task would be a simple one of getting the show on the road and making-if you would-a brief statement of your own. There will be no speeches. President Kennedy is making a brief statement that is being filmed and taped for the occasion and the rest will be a dramatic presentation of the awards and the reasons for giving them.

Your chairmanship would help to make this the truly great event it deserves to be. I do hope that your schedule will allow you to help us.

Dear Mrs. Murrow:

You are cordially invited to attend a Dean's Luncheon at The New York School of Social Work, Two East Ninety-first Street, on Monday, February 27, from 12:15 to 2:00 p.m. The Dean's Luncheons, started in 1952, are planned to bring community leaders, agency heads and our faculty members together for informal discussion of matters of mutual interest and concern. Our topic that day will be, "The School's Program for Foreign Students."

Recent developments all over the world, particularly in so-called underdeveloped countries, have greatly increased the need for trained social work personnel, as you well know. Our School of Social Work has long played a leading role in the preparation of foreign students for key positions in their own countries. At the present time we are intensively reviewing our curriculum for such students, to make certain that our present program will most effectively meet their practical needs and those of the countries from which they come. We believe you would enjoy hearing about this, and would contribute your knowledge and questions in frank discussion.

Please join us. We promise to stop our session promptly at 2 o'clock.

Looking forward to seeing you,

Sincerely,

January 16, 1961.

Dear Sir:

One year and a half ago, an informal group of Princeton undergraduates decided that they wanted to stage a symposium on world affairs. They realized it was a grandiose task they had set for themselves but as the dream developed, enthusiasm grew. An official committee, representing the whole student body was formed and granted a formal charter by the Undergraduate Council. The administration, including President Goheen, the Dean of Students, the Board of Trustees and numerous members of the faculty, gave it their "all out" support and encouragement. May I, as Chairman, on behalf of the Committee, the student community, indeed all of those associated with Princeton undergraduate life extend to you a most sincere invitation to speak at the 1961 Symposium on World Affairs, to be held April seventh, eighth, and ninth.

The theme to which we shall devote ourselves in the course of the symposium is America: The Question of "Creative Survival." Specifically, the purpose of the symposium is threefold:

1. To provide an opportunity for some of the nation's distinguished citizens to present their approaches to the challenges involved in preserving a "creative America."
2. To provide an opportunity for interested and active undergraduates at Princeton and from many other eastern colleges to participate in a well integrated week-end which disavows panaceas but hopes for a coherent exploration of the problems we as a nation must face.
3. To provide an opportunity for Princeton as an intellectual community community to contribute to our political and philosophical awareness, in short, to act in the nation's service.

In order to achieve these goals, we hope such areas as (a) the rights of the individual as opposed to the security of the nation, (b) private versus public spending, i.e., the future of the welfare state, and (c) efficiency (Soviet-style) versus free-flowing democratic capitalism will be deliberated.

A keynote Address would open the program Friday evening, April seventh, and would provide the framework for our discussion of some of the vital issues before America. It would be followed the next day by a series of speeches and a debate. The Symposium will conclude Sunday with a sermon in the University Chapel on the moral order in a materialistic world and with an afternoon Summation discussing the range of possibilities lying before America as a creative force.

The essential and underlying purposes of the Symposium are, in our mind, the very questions which it may present to the students of today, the leaders of tomorrow. We have emphasized in our letters to guest speakers the essential "youth-wants-to-know" quality we hope to achieve during the week-end. Parenthetically, we have formally invited representatives from approximately fifteen other educational institutions to come and participate with us.

The content of the discussions will deal mainly with many of the problems facing college students as indeed all of the mature world. Civil liberties and anti-discrimination policies, our relations toward under-developed countries, programs such as the one proposed by Senator Kennedy to establish a "Peace Corps," etcetera, will be discussed and evaluated. Informal gatherings will be held after each scheduled event so that a further communication of ideas and suggestions may be had between the guest speaker and his student audience.

Saturday evening, in order to affirm our feelings of close affiliation with all the peoples of the world we hope to stage an International Buffet and Dance. We have asked Mrs. Roosevelt to preside at the banquet at which various foods from Asian, European, and African nations will be served. Later in the evening, the United Nations' singers, the Traditional Israeli Dancers, and the Don Cossack Dancers, will provide entertainment.

The Princeton University Press will publish a verbatim summary of the week-ends results in an inexpensive hard-bound edition to be sold at the other universities across the country. Thus, other campuses will become aware of the Symposium and may be encouraged to establish their own.

We, the "Symposium" Committee, would be honored if you would consent to deliver an address on the effect of "mass" communication on the "responsible" and deliberating individual, Saturday morning, April 8, 1961 at 10:30 a.m. We shall assume all expenses incurred during your stay, including travel expenses and an honorarium of five hundred dollars. We realize that this amount is small, but it is all that we can afford with our limited budget.

For such interest on your part we shall remain most grateful.

Respectfully yours,

Edward A. Weisband

Dear Miss Rejahl:

Please pardon the delay in answering your gracious letter of January 9th. The increased activity engendered by the numerous year-end programs and some additional traveling caused me to fall behind with my correspondence.

I greatly appreciate your kind invitation to speak at your annual meeting in May, and I regret to have to decline. It has been my unhappy task to be forced to choose between making speeches and fulfilling my radio and television commitments. I am therefore unable to accept any invitations to speak no matter how attractive the occasion may be.

Thank you again for asking me.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

On May 4 and 5, of this year, our Association will hold its annual meeting in Wausau, Wisconsin, but more important we will be commemorating the 50th anniversary of the establishment of vocational and adult education in our State.

On the evening of May 4, we hope to present an outstanding individual, not only for our own membership, but for the citizens of the Wausau community as well.

You have been suggested as the first choice for this part of our program, and this letter is to inquire if you would be available on this date, and if so, at what fee.

In this part of our country, there are not many opportunities for us to see and hear outstanding platform personalities.

While our budget is limited, we are hopeful you might consider an appearance which would mark the 50th anniversary of one of the first and most unique systems of vocational and adult education in this country.

May I please hear from you.

Sincerely,

Clare D. Rejahl

Dear Mrs. Diamond:

Many thanks for your gracious letter of December 21st.

I greatly appreciate your kind invitation to be the guest speaker at your National Luncheon on March 14th and very much regret that I cannot accept. The fact is that my radio and television commitments are such that I have had to decide to devote myself to that side of my work and not undertake any speeches no matter how tempting the occasion.

Thank you again for asking me.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As a pioneer you blazed a trail by bringing to us famous national and international personalities and their homes via television. It is most complimentary to you that others followed in your footsteps and adopted your techniques.

You also clarify to us the national issues which otherwise would puzzle many of us. We are particularly grateful to you for accurately reporting conditions in Israel.

Therefore, we would like to express our deep appreciation to you at our National Luncheon on March 14th, 1961 at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel. Would you bestow a great honor upon us by being our guest speaker? May we be privileged to present a citation to you in gratitude for your concern for mankind of all creeds.

Former guests were Senator Kerr of Oklahoma, Senator Humphrey of Minnesota and Governor McKeldin of Maryland.

The usual attendance is 1200 guests, and with your magic name I know that many more would attend.

Please find a place in your heart to make all these people happy.

Cordially yours,
Jeanette G. Diamond

PRAISE, my soul, the King of Heaven,

Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him!
Praise the everlasting King.

Praise Him for His grace and favour
To our fathers in distress;
Praise Him, still the same for ever,
Slow to chide, and swift to bless.
Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him!
Glorious in His faithfulness.

Father-like, He tends and spares us;
Well our feeble frame He knows;
In His hands He gently bears us,
Rescues us from all our foes.
Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him!
Widely as his mercy flows.

Angels, help us to adore Him;
Ye behold Him face to face;
Sun and Moon, bow down before Him;
Dwellers all in time and space,
Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him!
Praise with us the God of grace.

THE FORM OF

SOLEMNIZATION OF MATRIMONY

¶ At the day and time appointed for solemnization of Matrimony, the persons to be married shall come into the body of the Church with their friends and neighbours: and there standing together, the Man on the right hand and the Woman on the left, THE DEAN shall say

DEARLY beloved, we are gathered together here in the sight of God, and in the face of this congregation, to join together this Man and this Woman in holy Matrimony; which is an honourable estate, instituted of God himself, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his Church; which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence, and first miracle that he wrought, in Cana of Galilee; and is commended in Holy Writ to be honourable among all men; and therefore is not by any to be enterprised, nor taken in hand, unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly; but reverently, discreetly, soberly, and in the fear of God, duly considering the causes for which Matrimony was ordained.

First, It was ordained for the increase of mankind according to the will of God and that children might be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and to the praise of his holy Name.

Secondly, It was ordained in order that the natural affections implanted by God should be hallowed and controlled; that those who are called of God to this holy estate should live chastely in matrimony, and thus in holiness and pureness of living mankind should dwell together in families.

Thirdly, It was ordained for the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity.

Into which holy estate these two persons present come now to be joined. Therefore if any man can shew any just cause, why they may not lawfully be joined together let him now speak, or else hereafter for ever hold his peace.

The Couple Now Stand before The Archbishop of Canterbury

¶ Then speaking unto the persons that shall be married, THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY shall say

I REQUIRE and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that if either of you know any impediment, why ye may not be lawfully joined together in Matrimony, ye do now confess it. For be ye well assured, that so many as are coupled together otherwise than God's word doth allow are not joined together by God; neither is their Matrimony lawful.

¶ If no impediment be alleged, then shall the Archbishop say unto the Man

PHILIP, wilt thou have this Woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?

¶ The Man shall answer

I will.

¶ Then shall the Archbishop say unto the Woman

ELIZABETH ALEXANDRA MARY, wilt thou have this Man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?

¶ The Woman shall answer

I will.

¶ Then shall the Archbishop say

Who giveth this Woman to be married to this Man ?

¶ Then shall they give their troth to each other in this manner

The Archbishop, receiving the Woman at her father's hands, shall cause the Man with his right hand to take the Woman by her right hand, and to say after him as followeth Right Hands Clasped.

I PHILIP take thee ELIZABETH ALEXANDRA MARY to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth.

¶ Then shall they loose their hands; and the Woman with her right hand taking the Man by his right hand, shall likewise say after the Archbishop

I ELIZABETH ALEXANDRA MARY take thee PHILIP to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I give thee my troth.

The Ring of Welsh gold is Placed upon the Prayer Book Phillip Places on Brides Left hand.

¶ Then shall they again loose their hands; and the Man shall give unto the Woman a Ring, laying the same upon the book. And the Archbishop, taking the Ring, shall deliver it unto the Man to put it upon the fourth finger of the Woman's left hand. And the Man holding the Ring there, and taught by the Archbishop, shalt say

WITH this Ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow: In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Bride & Bridegroom KNEEL

¶ Then the Man leaving the Ring upon the fourth finger of the Woman's left hand, they shall both kneel down ; THE CONGREGATION SHALL REMAIN STANDING, and the Archbishop shall say

Let us pray.

O ETERNAL God, Creator and Preserver of all mankind, Giver of all spiritual grace, the Author of everlasting life; Send thy blessing upon these thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in thy Name; that these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made (whereof this Ring given and received is a token and pledge), and may ever remain in perfect love and peace together, and live according to thy laws; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Archbishop join their right hands together, and say

Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.

Then shall the Archbishop speak unto the people

FORASMUCH as PHILIP and ELIZABETH ALEXANDRA MARY have consented together in holy wedlock, and have witnessed the same before God and this company, and thereto have given and pledged their troth either to other, and have declared the same by giving and receiving of a Ring, and by joining of hands; I pronounce that they be Man and Wife together, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

¶ And the Archbishop shall add this Blessing

GOD the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, bless, preserve, and keep you; the Lord mercifully with his favour look upon you; and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace, that ye may so live together in this life, that in the world to come ye may have life everlasting. Amen.

They are Now Man & Wife & Follow the Archbishop to the High Alter-while the Choir sing the Psalm -

¶ Then shall the Archbishop, followed by the Man and the Woman, go to the Lord's Table ; this Psalm being sung

Psalm lxvii . . . . . E. C. Bairstow

GOD be merciful unto us, and bless us: and shew us the light of his countenance, and be merciful unto us.

That thy way may be known upon earth: thy saving health among all nations.

Let the people praise thee, O God: yea, let all the people praise thee.

O let the nations rejoice and be glad: for thou shalt judge the folk righteously, and govern the nations upon earth.

Let the people praise thee, O God: yea, let all the people praise thee.

Then shall the earth bring forth her increase: and God, even our own God, shall give us his blessing.

God shall bless us: and all the ends of the world shall fear him.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be: world without end. Amen.

¶ The Psalm ended, the people shall kneel, and the Man and the Woman kneeling before the Lord's Table, THE PRECENTOR standing at the Table, and turning his face towards them shall say (They Kneel) (speaks)

Lord, have mercy upon us.

Answer. Christ have mercy upon us.

Precentor. Lord, have mercy upon us.

OUR Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

Precentor. O Lord, save thy servant, and thy handmaid;

Answer. Who put their trust in thee.

Precentor. O Lord, send them help from thy holy place;

Answer. And evermore defend them.

Precentor. Be unto them a tower of strength,

Answer. From the face of their enemy.

Precentor. O Lord, hear our prayer.

Answer. And let our cry come unto thee.

O GOD of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, bless these thy servants, and sow the seed of eternal life in their hearts; that whatsoever in thy holy Word they shall profitably learn, they may in deed fulfil the same. Look, O Lord, mercifully upon them from heaven, and bless them. That they obeying thy will, and alway being in safety under thy protection, may abide in thy love unto their lives' end; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ Then Now ~ shall THE DEAN ~~say~~ of Westminster

O MERCIFUL Lord and heavenly Father, by whose gracious gift mankind is increased; bestow, we beseech thee, upon these two persons the heritage and gift of children; and grant that they may live together so long in godly love and honesty, that they may see their children christianly and virtuously brought up, to thy praise and honour; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O GOD, who by thy mighty power hast made all things of nothing; who also (after other things set in order) didst appoint, that out of man (created after thine own image and similitude) woman should take her beginning; and, knitting them together, didst teach that it should never be lawful to put asunder those whom thou by Matrimony hadst made one: O God, who has consecrated the state of Matrimony to such an excellent mystery, that in it is signified and represented the spiritual marriage and unity betwixt Christ and his Church; Look mercifully upon these thy servants, that both this man may love his wife, according to thy Word (as Christ did love his spouse the Church, who gave himself for it, loving and cherishing it even as his own flesh), and also that this woman may be loving and amiable, faithful and obedient to her husband; and in all quietness, sobriety, and peace, be a follower of holy and godly matrons. O Lord, bless them both, and grant them to inherit thy everlasting kingdom; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ALMIGHTY God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Pour upon you the riches of his grace, sanctify and bless you, that ye may please him both in body and soul, and live together in holy love unto your lives' end. Amen.

¶ Then shall be sung the following

Motet . . . . . William McKie

Archb of York to High Alter

WE wait for thy loving kindness, O God: in the midst of thy Temple,

O God, according to thy Name, so is thy praise unto the world's end; thy right hand is full of righteousness.

Alleluya. Alleluya.

We wait for thy loving kindness, O God; in the midst of thy Temple,

O Lord, send us now prosperity. Amen.

Now the ADDRESS BY THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

Yorke

Chorley Premiss

¶ Then shall be sung the following Hymn

THE Lord's my shepherd, I'll not want,
He makes me down to lie
In pastures green : He leadeth me
The quiet waters by.

My soul He doth restore again ;
And me to walk doth make
Within the paths of righteousness,
Ev'n for His own name's sake.

Yea, though I walk in death's dark vale,
Yet will I fear none ill ;
For thou art with me ; and thy rod
And staff me comfort still.

My table thou hast furnished
In presence of my foes ;
My head thou dost with oil anoint,
And my cup overflows.

Goodness and mercy all my life
Shall surely follow me.
And in God's house for evermore
My dwelling-place shall be.

¶ Then shall THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY dismiss those that are gathered together saying

Let us pray.

O ALMIGHTY Lord and everlasting God, vouchsafe we beseech thee, to direct, sanctify and govern, both our hearts and bodies, in the ways of thy laws, and in the works of thy commandments; that through thy most mighty protection, both here and ever, we may be preserved in body and soul; through our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE Blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be amongst you and remain with you always.

AMEN . . . . . Orlando Gibbons

ANTHEM . . . . . Samuel Sebastian Wesley

BLESSED be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Which, according to His abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled that fadeth not away, reserved in Heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.

But as He Which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation.

Pass the time of your sojourning here in fear.

See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently.

Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God.

For all flesh is as grass, and the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away;

But the word of the Lord endureth for evermore. Amen.

REMEMBRANCE SUNDAY

NOVEMBER 9th, 1947

10.30 and 11.15 a.m.

10.30 a.m.

E.H. 450

O God, our help in ages past,
  Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
  And our eternal home ;

Under the shadow of thy throne
  Thy Saints have dwelt secure ;
Sufficient is thine arm alone,
  And our defence is sure.

Before the hills in order stood,
  Or earth received her frame,
From everlasting thou art God,
  To endless years the same.

A thousand ages in thy sight
  Are like an evening gone,
Short as the watch that ends the night
  Before the rising sun.

Time, like an ever-rolling stream,
  Bears all its sons away ;
They fly forgotten, as a dream
  Dies at the opening day.

O God, our help in ages past,
  Our hope for years to come,
Be thou our guard while troubles last,
  And our eternal home.

William Croft (1678-1727) Isaac Watts (1674-1748)

Then shall the Precentor say :

Let us kneel and humbly confess our sins to Almighty God.

(To be said all together)

O God, our Father, we have sinned against thee in thought, word, and deed : we have not loved thee with all our heart : we have not loved our neighbours as ourselves. Have mercy upon us, we beseech thee : cleanse us from our sins : and help us to overcome our faults ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

And the Precentor shall say :

May the Almighty and merciful Lord grant unto us pardon and remission of all our sins, time for amendment of life, and the grace and comfort of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

O Lord, open thou our lips.
And our mouth shall shew forth thy praise.
O God, make speed to save us.
O Lord, make haste to help us.

(All standing)

Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost :

As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

Praise ye the Lord.

The Lord's Name be praised.

PSALM LXVII.

Deus misereatur.

God be merciful unto us, and bless us : and shew us the light of his countenance, and be merciful unto us ;

That thy way may be known upon earth : thy saving health among all nations.

Let the people praise thee, O God : yea, let all the people praise thee.

O let the nations rejoice and be glad : for thou shalt judge the folk righteously, and govern the nations upon earth.

Let the people praise thee, O God : let all the people praise thee.

Then shall the earth bring forth her increase : and God, even our own God, shall give us his blessing.

God shall bless us : and all the ends of the world shall fear him.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost ;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

Then shall the Congregation sit and there shall be read :

The Lesson.

REVELATION XXI, 1—5.

And I saw a new heaven and a new earth : for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away ; and there was no more sea.

And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband.

And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God.

And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes ; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain : for the former things are passed away

And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write : for these words are true and faithful.

Then all shall stand and there shall be sung :

Blake's " JERUSALEM " ... ... Parry

The first verse sung by the Choir only.

And did those feet in ancient time
Walk upon England's mountains green ?
And was the holy Lamb of God
On England's pleasant pastures seen ?
And did the countenance divine
Shine forth upon our clouded hills ?
And was Jerusalem builded here
Among those dark satanic mills ?

To be sung by all.

Bring me my bow of burning gold
Bring me my arrows of desire !
Bring me my spear ! O clouds, unfold !
Bring me my chariot of fire !
I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

Then shall be recited by all :

THE APOSTLES' CREED.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth :

And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, Who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, Born of the Virgin Mary, Suffered under Pontius Pilate, Was crucified, dead, and buried, He descended into hell ; The third day he rose again from the dead. He ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty ; From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Ghost ; the holy Catholick Church ; The Communion of Saints ; The Forgiveness of sins ; the Resurrection of the body ; And the life everlasting. Amen.

AN ACT OF REMEMBRANCE.

Then shall the Congregation kneel and the Precentor shall say :

Let us pray.

Lord have mercy upon us.
Answer : Christ have mercy upon us.
Lord have mercy upon us.

Our Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation ; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

O eternal Lord God, who holdest all souls in life : we beseech thee to shed forth upon thy whole Church in Paradise and on earth the bright beams of thy light and thy heavenly comfort ; and grant that we, following the good example of those who have loved and served thee here and are now at rest, may with them at length enter into the fulness of thine unending joy ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Grant, we beseech thee, O Almighty God, that all who here do honour to the memory of our brethren's sacrifice, may so be filled with the spirit of their love and fortitude, that forgetting all selfish and unworthy aims they may live only to the glory of God and to the service of their fellow-men ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Grant them O Lord eternal rest and let light perpetual shine upon them. Amen.

Then shall the Congregation stand while the Procession moves to the Grave of the Unknown Warrior, singing the following :

E.H. 490

The King of love my Shepherd is,
Whose goodness faileth never ;
I nothing lack if I am his
And he is mine for ever.

Where streams of living water flow
My ransomed soul he leadeth,
And where the verdant pastures grow
With food celestial feedeth.

Perverse and foolish oft I strayed,
But yet in love he sought me,
And on his shoulder gently laid,
And home, rejoicing, brought me.

In death's dark vale I fear no ill
With thee, dear Lord, beside me ;
Thy rod and staff my comfort still,
Thy Cross before to guide me.

Thou spread'st a table in my sight ;
Thy unction grace bestoweth :
And O what transport of delight
From thy pure chalice floweth !

And so through all the length of days
Thy goodness faileth never ;
Good Shepherd, may I sing thy praise
Within thy house for ever.

Ancient Irish Melody Sir H. W. Baker (1821-77)

And a Solemn March shall be played.

THE CONTAKION OF THE FAITHFUL DEPARTED.

Give rest, O Christ, to thy servants with thy Saints, where sorrow and pain are no more, neither sighing, but life everlasting.

Thou only art immortal, the Creator and Maker of man : and we are mortal, formed of the earth, and unto earth shall we return : for so thou didst ordain when thou createdst me, saying, Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. All we go down to the dust ; and, weeping o'er the grave, we make our song, Hallelujah.

At 11 o'clock there shall be kept for the space of two minutes.

THE RÉVEILLÉ.

Then shall be sung :

E.H. 134

Jesus lives ! thy terrors now
Can, O Death, no more appal us ;
Jesus lives ! by this we know
Thou, O grave, canst not enthral us.
Alleluya !

Jesus lives ! henceforth is death
But the gate of life immortal ;
This shall calm our trembling breath,
When we pass its gloomy portal.
Alleluya !

Jesus lives ! for us he died ;
Then, alone to Jesus living,
Pure in heart may we abide,
Glory to our Saviour giving,
Alleluya !

Jesus lives ! our hearts know well
Nought from us his love shall sever ;
Life, nor death, nor powers of hell
Tear us from his keeping ever.
Alleluya !

Jesus lives ! to him the throne
Over all the world is given ;
May we go where he is gone,
Rest and reign with him in heaven.
Alleluya !

H. J. Gauntlett (1805-70) C. F. Gellert (1715-69)

Then shall the following prayer be said by the Dean, the people standing :

A PRAYER FOR THE NATIONS.

O almighty and most merciful God, Father of us all, who in thy holy word has taught us that all kingdoms of the world are to become the kingdom of thy Son, send thy blessing, we beseech thee, upon the Rulers and Governors of the people and upon all who are seeking to kindle the desire for righteousness and peace among the nations of the world. Guide their counsels with the light of thy Holy Spirit of wisdom and truth, so that in their work they may glorify thy holy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

And the Dean shall pronounce

THE BLESSING.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

Retiring Collection for the Earl Haig British Legion Fund.

11.15 a.m.

SOLEMN EUCHARIST OF REMEMBRANCE AND DEDICATION

INTROIT.

E.H. 733 (Music : Traditional)

Rest eternal grant unto them, O Lord : and may light perpetual shine upon them.

Thou, O God, art praised in Syon, and unto thee shall the vow be performed in Jerusalem : thou that hearest the prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come.

Rest eternal grant unto them, O Lord ; and may light perpetual shine upon them.

COLLECTS.

O God, our refuge and strength, who art the author of all godliness : Be ready, we beseech thee, to hear the devout prayers of thy Church ; and grant that those things which we ask faithfully we may obtain effectually ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O eternal Lord God, who holdest all souls in life : We beseech thee to shed forth upon thy whole Church in Paradise and on earth the bright beams of thy light and heavenly comfort ; and grant that we, following the good example of those who have loved and served thee here and are now at rest, may at the last enter with them into the fulness of thine unending joy ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O almighty and most merciful God, of thy bountiful goodness keep us, we beseech thee, from all things that may hurt us ; that we, being ready both in body and soul, may cheerfully accomplish those things that thou wouldest have done ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE EPISTLE.

HEBREWS XI, 13—16.

These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare painfully that they seek a country. And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly : wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God : for he hath prepared for them a city.

GRADUAL.

E.H. 308

Father, see thy children bending at thy throne,
Pleading here the Passion of thine only Son,
Pleading here before thee all his dying love,
As he pleads it ever in the courts above.

Not for our wants only we this Offering plead,
But for all thy children who thy mercy need :
Bless thy faithful people, win thy wandering sheep,
Keep the souls departed who in Jesus sleep.

Dutch Melody W. H. H. Jervois and W. B. T.

THE HOLY GOSPEL.

ST. MATTHEW XX, 20—28

Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children with her sons, worshipping him, and desiring a certain thing of him. And he said unto her, What wilt thou ? She saith unto him, Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom. But Jesus answered and said, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with ? They say unto him, We are able. And he saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with : but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father. And when the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation against the two brethren. But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you : but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister ; And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant : Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

THE NICENE CREED.

(To be said by all, standing)

I believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, And of all things visible and invisible :

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, Begotten of his Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of very God, Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made : Who for us men, and for our salvation came down from heaven, And was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, And was made man, And was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate. He suffered and was buried, And the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, And ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of the Father. And he shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead : Whose kingdom shall have no end.

And I believe in the Holy Ghost, The Lord and giver of life, Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, Who spake by the Prophets. And I believe one Catholick and Apostolick Church. I acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins. And I look for the Resurrection of the dead, And the life of the world to come. Amen.

THE SERMON

BY THE REV. F. LEWIS DONALDSON, M.A.,

Sub-Dean : Canon in Residence.

OFFERTORY.

A. & M. 536

There is a land of pure delight,
Where Saints immortal reign ;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers ;
Death, like a narrow sea, divides
That heavenly land from ours.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dress'd in living green ;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan roll'd between.

But timorous mortals start and shrink
To cross the narrow sea,
And linger shivering on the brink,
And fear to launch away.

Oh, could we make our doubts remove,
Those gloomy doubts that rise,
And see the Canaan that we love
With unbeclouded eyes :

Could we but climb where Moses stood,
And view the landscape o'er ;
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood,
Should fright us from the shore. Amen.

G. M. Garrett Isaac Watt (1707)

After the Consecration shall be sung to the music of John Merbecke :

O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us.
O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us.
O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, grant us thy peace.

And this Anthem (music : Traditional) :

E.H. 733

May light eternal shine upon them, O Lord : for endless ages with thy blest ones, for thou art merciful.

Rest eternal grant to them, O Lord, and may light perpetual shine upon them : for endless ages with thy blest ones, for thou are merciful.

During the Administration :

E.H. 335

Wherefore, O Father, we thy humble servants
Here bring before thee Christ thy well-beloved,
All-perfect Offering, Sacrifice immortal,
Spotless Oblation.

See now thy children, making intercession
Through him our Saviour, Son of God incarnate,
For all thy people, living and departed,
Pleading before thee.

Rouen Melody W. H. H. Jervois (1892-1905)

Gloria in Excelsis

(To be said by all, standing)

Glory be to God on high, and in earth peace, good will towards men. We praise thee, we bless thee, we worship thee, we glorify thee, we give thanks to thee for thy great glory, O Lord God, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty.

O Lord, the only-begotten Son Jesu Christ ; O Lord God, Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us. Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us. Thou that takest away the sins of the world, receive our prayer. Thou that sittest at the right hand of God the Father, have mercy upon us.

For thou only art holy ; thou only art the Lord ; thou only, O Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in the glory of God the Father. Amen

After the Blessing there shall be sung :

May they rest in peace. Amen.

E.H. 479

Soldiers of Christ, arise,
And put your armour on ;
Strong in the strength which God supplies,
Through his eternal Son ;

Strong in the Lord of Hosts,
And in his mighty power ;
Who in the strength of Jesus trusts
Is more than conqueror.

Stand then in his great might,
With all his strength endued ;
And take, to arm you for the fight,
The panoply of God.

From strength to strength go on,
Wrestle, and fight, and pray ;
Tread all the powers of darkness down,
And win the well-fought day.

That having all things done,
And all your conflicts past,
Ye may o'ercome, through Christ alone,
And stand entire at last.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE:

Six hundred rooms.

Buckingham Palace has been the London residence of every British sovereign for more than one hundred years. It is the birthplace of two Kings - William IV and Edward XXX Vll - and of a King-to-be, Prince Charles, Duke of Cornwall. Queen Elizabeth II was born at 12 Bruton Street.

It was King George III, great-great-great-great-grandfather of the present Queen, (said to be "a home-loving man of simple tastes",) who in 1762 bought for the sum of 28 thousand pounds (about 83 thousand dollars), the original Buckingham House, home of the Dukes of Buckingham, around which the present Palace has been built and from which it takes its name.

Though George III brought the building into the royal possession and his son, George IV, XXX rebuilt it, the Queens of Britain have been largely responsible for making the Palace what it is today. In 1819 George IV decided to remodel and refurnish Buckingham House. John Nash, designer of London's Regent Street and a leading architect and town planner of the day, was put in charge of the undertaking. As many as 1,000 men were engaged on the building at a time, working until 10 p.m. by candlelight. Yet progress was so slow that George IV, who died in 1830, never lived to see his beautiful home completed.

His brother and successor, William IV, disliked the Palace so much that he refused to live in it and tried, without success, to foist it on the army as a barracks, and then on the government as a House of Parliament. There were even rumors that he would sell it if only he could find a bidder. By 1837, when the Palace was finally finished, Nash had died of old age and his place had been taken by Edward Blore, designer of Abbotsford, the famous home of Sir Walter Scott.

The new Palace had come to be regarded as an expensive white elephant, derogatively nicknamed the "Palace of Pimlico", when the 18-year-old Queen Victoria astonished everyone by deciding that it was from Buckingham Palace (and not from St. James's or Kensington)that she would rule. Since then, though Buckingham Palace has been gradually modernised and in parts remodelled, there have been no structural alterations.

The Queen still holds court in the the same suite of twelve State Apartments as was used by Queen Victoria. Investitures, the Presentation Parties and any big Evening Parties which the Queen may in the future hold, all take place in the Ball Room. Guests dance to the latest dance tunes in this same Ball Room to which their great-grandmothers and grandmothers came in crinolines and Edwardian gowns.

It is more than eighty years since Queen Victoria transferred her "drawing-rooms", forerunners of our pre-war courts and post-war presentation parties, from St. James's to Buckingham Palace. Yet foreign diplomats are still accredited to the "Court of St. James", though it is at Buckingham Palace that they present their letters of credence to Queen Elizabeth II.

The Palace stood empty for much of the long Victorian reign, for the widowed Queen preferred the greater seclusion of her other homes (Clarence House, etc.); and it was the reign of George V and Queen Mary which brought the biggest changes. Internally, though there was no important structural alteration, the reign of George V brought a revolution in organisation. The Late Queen Mary was the first Queen who seriously concerned herself with the running of the royal household. The primitive plumbing was overhauled. New bathrooms were installed and sinks and taps (faucets to you!) fitted to save carrying water so far for cleaning purposes. The ~~XXXXXX~~ antiquated kitchens were remodelled and then kept up-to-date, and the private apartments were refurnished so that they became both more artistic and more home-like. A Household dining-room 50 feet wide and 30 feet wide doesn't sound very homelike, but this is where the members of the Household take their meals.

Prince Charles, Duke of Cornwall, and Princess Anne share a day nursery overlooking the Mall, and each of the children has a night nursery nearby.

The private apartments of the Royal Family are said to be "homelike". As in other homes the rooms reflect the taste of their owners. There are favorite pictures on the walls, and family photographs on mantelpieces and tables. The Queen and the Duke of EXX Edinburgh have both radio and television in their private apartments.

The Speaker's Coach is more than 250 years old and believed to be one of the oldest vehicles in working order in the world. Queen Anne is thought to have used it at her Coronation. Then comes the Queen in the State Coach, to be drawn by eight Greys. Her Majesty will be in her traditional Parliament Robe of crimson velvet furred with ermine, and wearing on her head a diadem. This diadem or circlet, sometimes called the Maltese Circlet, was worn by Queen Victoria at her Coronation and is shown in a famous picture of her by Winterhalter. It was also worn by our present Queen at the State Opening of Parliament. With Her Majesty in the State Coach, sitting on her left, will be the Duke of Edinburgh in the full-dress uniform of an Admiral of the Fleet.

Her Royal Highness The Princess ELIZABETH Alexandra Mary, Colonel Grenadier Guards, Fellow of the Royal Society, Heiress Presumptive to the Throne. (House of Windsor).

Born April 21st, 1926, at 17 Bruton Street, London, W.1. (Home of her Maternal Grandparents). Eldest daughter of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. (At time of her birth, her parents were the Duke and Duchess of York).

Note: Throughout this summary Princess Elizabeth will be referred to as "H.R.H." for the sake of brevity.

On 11th December 1936 she was informed of the Abdication of her Uncle, King Edward VIII, and that her parents were now King and Queen and she was Heiress Presumptive to the Throne.

In October 1940 H.R.H. broadcast for the first time to the Children of the Empire at Home and Overseas in BBC Children's Hour.

In February 1942 she was appointed Colonel, Grenadier Guards and Inspected the Regiment in 1943.

She was also appointed a Counsellor of State during the King's absence visiting troops in Italy in 1943.

Her first major public engagement was the secret launching of the battleship Vanguard from Clydebank in 1944.

In March 1945 H.R.H. was granted a Commission in the Auxiliary Territorial Service as a Second Subaltern and she attended a Training Course at a Driving Centre - she passed as Qualified to drive and maintain all classes of Army vehicles.

She had also been trained as a Sea Ranger after being in the Girl Guides.

H.R.H.'s 21st Birthday was celebrated at Capetown during the Royal Visit to South Africa. It was at this time that she broadcast the Dedication of herself to the service of the Nation. She was also made Colonel in Chief of Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders.

Her Engagement was first made public in a Court Circular issued from Buckingham Palace on 9th July 1947.

She is four years and ten months younger than Lieut. Mountbatten.

Her annual allowance from the age of 21 is £15,000. Her allowance when she is married is now being considered by a Select Committee of the Government.

She is a great great grand daughter of Queen Victoria who married her Consort after she came to the Throne nearly 108 years ago.

The Royal couple first met in 1937.

HFGO

Lieutenant Philip Mountbatten, R.N.

He was born on the 10th June 1921 in his father's house in Corfu. His father was the late General Prince Andrew of Greece and of Denmark, G.C.V.O. His Mother was Princess Alice of Battenburg. Prince Philip is a great great grandson of Queen Victoria and a great nephew of Queen Alexandra, and a second cousin of the King.

Prince Philip's grandfather, both his uncles and his first cousin, (and Best Man) the Marquess of Milford Haven, have devoted their lives to the Royal Navy, which Prince Philip himself entered as a Cadet in 1939.

At the Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, he was awarded the King's Dirk as the finest all-round Cadet of his term. By 1940 he was on active service and in January 1941 was mentioned in despatches for his part in the searchlight control in H.M.S. Valiant during the battle of Cape Matapan. Promotion followed and soon after his 21st Birthday in 1942 he was appointed First Lieutenant in H.M.S. Wallace. He was the youngest officer in the Royal Navy holding such a responsible position.

Both Prince Philip, his cousin, the third Marquess of Milford Haven, and his uncle Viscount Mountbatten, were all in the war against Japan up to the last.

On 18th March this year he formally became a naturalised British subject, at the same time he relinquished the title of Prince and adopted the English surname of Mountbatten, a name already famous in the history of the Navy. He is now an instructor at the Royal Naval Training Establishment for Petty Officers at Corsham in Wiltshire.

He has spent most of his life in England, having made his home with his uncle and guardian, Admiral Mountbatten. He was educated at an English preparatory school at Cheam and at a Scottish Public School, Gordonstoun. In the Royal Navy he has shown outstanding qualities as an athlete, a scholar and a leader of men. He has long been on terms of close friendship with the Royal Family.

The Royal Marriage Act.

The Royal Marriage is controlled by the Royal Marriage Act of 1772. This Act was passed through Parliament by George III as a result of quarrels with his brothers over their marrying certain subjects. By this Act no descendant of the body of George II, except the issue of Princesses married to foreign families, can make a valid marriage unless the King has given consent under the Great Seal. But such subjects on reaching the age of 25 may marry without Royal sanction after giving twelve months notice to the Privy Council.

The special licence for the Wedding was issued from the Faculty Office of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury on 22nd September on receipt of H.M. Royal Assent signed by the King under the Great Seal. It had previously been declared in Council. The Licence was flown to Balmoral where the Royal Family were staying.

HFGO

Westminster Abbey (Historical details in Appendix II)

The present marriage is the first of an Heir to the Throne to take place within the Abbey walls. It is only since 1919 that Royal marriages in the Abbey have revived a custom of many hundreds of years ago. The last of these was the marriage of Richard II to Anne of Bohemia in 1382 which took place "at the Church in Westminster". The Royal marriages which have taken place in the Abbey since then are as follows:

Princess Patricia of Connaught in 1919
Princess Mary in 1922
King George VI (then Duke of York) 26th April 1923
Duke of Kent in 1934

Some other important Royal Marriages were:

Queen Victoria in Chapel Royal, St. James, 1840
Edward VII in Chapel Royal, Windsor, 1863
George V in Chapel Royal, St. James, 1893
Duke of Gloucester in Buckingham Palace, 6th November 1935

No staging or platforms will be erected in the Abbey as was done for the Coronation. 800 chairs are being lent by the Ministry of Works which will bring the seating accommodation up to about 2,500.

Form of Service

The Marriage Service will be as in the Book of Common Prayer for the Church of England. It is entitled "The Form of Solemnization of Matrimony".

The old form of Marriage Service will be used which includes the words "To love, cherish and obey". The remainder of the Service follows the form used at the wedding of the King and Queen in 1923. The Revised Version of the Prayer Book published in 1928 in which the word 'Obey' is omitted, was not accepted by Parliament nor consequently by the King though it had the approval of the Bishops. It is therefore not in fact legally recognised though frequently used at the present time. There has been a little criticism of the use of the old form of service - mainly from women, who feel that it is not in keeping with their present emancipated state.

At the conclusion of the service a fanfare will be sounded followed by the singing of the National Anthem. Afterwards the Registers will be signed in the Chapel of St. Edward the Confessor during which the anthem "Blessed be the God and Father" by Samuel Sebastian Wesley will be sung.

Four Registers in all will be laid out in the Chapel to be signed. They are the duplicate Registers kept traditionally by the Abbey, the Royal book in which are recorded all Births, Marriages and Deaths in the Royal Family and the big white book of the Abbey recording all its great visitors.

PART II

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE WEDDING

The Best Man

The best man will be 28 year-old Lord Milford Haven. He and Lieutenant Mountbatten were at Cheam School and Dartmouth Naval College together. They are first cousins. Lord Milford Haven was a Sub-Lieutenant in the Royal Navy at the outbreak of war. He has been twice honoured - in 1942 was made an O.B.E. for courage displayed in the destroyer Kandahar sunk in a minefield and in 1943 was awarded the D.S.C. for his part in a Malta Convoy. His grandfather, Prince Louis of Battenburg, was First Sea Lord in 1914 and his Father was a Lieutenant, R.N. in Dogger Bank and Jutland actions. Lord Milford Haven is the third Marquess and succeeded his father in 1938.

It is hoped that the Sovereign's and Captain's Escorts of the Household Cavalry will appear in their traditional Full Dress. About 1,500 Service Men will be on parade including detachments of the Royal Navy, R.A.F., Marines, Territorial Army and Sandhurst Cadets.

The pathway to the Abbey West Door will be lined by representatives of 16th/5th Lancers, Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders, Grenadier Guards, the A.T.S. and the Navy.

HFGO

Eight Chief Petty Officers or Petty Officers of the R.N. will form one of five groups lining the pathway. They will be selected from those who have served with Lieut. M. at the R.N. School at Corsham and they will represent various branches of the Service.

1,000 Boy Scouts will sell programmes along the Wedding routes.

Following the ceremony there will be a four-hour peal of the bells. The richly engraved Abbey gold plate will adorn the High Altar. The only floral decoration in the Abbey will be chrysanthemums. The Abbey choir of 34 men and boys will be augmented with 16 choristers from the Chapels Royal.

H.R.H. will travel to the Abbey in the Irish State Coach and return in the high seated glass coach with her husband. The Irish Coach, big, bulky and weighing three tons, was acquired by Queen Victoria in Ireland. It is generally used by the King, when driving to State Levees in St. James' Palace.

Driver of the Irish State Coach will be Mr. F. McIlveen, King's Head Coachman. The Driver of the Glass Coach from the Abbey to Buckingham Palace will be Mr. R. Land. The horses will all come from the Palace Mews. Four of the horses taking part are fine greys which were recently given to H.M. the King by Queen Wilhelmina of Holland. They are all the famous WINDSOR GREYS.

26 Boy Scouts will hand out the Service papers to the Wedding guests in the Abbey.

Three Fanfares have been specially composed by Sir Arnold Bax, Master of the King's Musick.

Some of the thirty black and brown horses Queen Wilhelmina of Holland gave the King last year will be used to mount the outriders and some of the Household Cavalry.

The Wedding date is also the centenary of the Rev. Henry Francis Lyte, author of "Abide with Me" who died in 1847. The opening hymn of the Wedding Service - "Praise my Soul the King of Heaven" is also by Henry Francis Lyte.

Gold for the wedding ring comes from Merionethshire, Wales. It was mined in 1937. Welsh gold is considered lucky for wedding rings. This is the same gold as the Windsor and Gloucester wedding rings.

The gold pen with which H.R.H. and Lieut. M. will sign the Registers will be the same as used by the King and Queen at their wedding in 1923.

On this occasion women will be dressed as for any smart event and gloves need not now be white.

The silk for H.R.H.'s dresses has been woven at Dumfermline, Fifeshire, by the daughters of Scottish miners. The fabrics for the bridesmaids' dresses have been made by a Nottingham firm who have been making dresses and bridal nets for society weddings for fifty years. H.R.H.'s going away costumes have been woven by a French firm at Lyons and a British firm at Barnoldswick in Yorkshire. Dresses and costumes have all been designed by Norman Hartnell of London.

The H.R.H. Wedding Train has been made from twenty pounds of raw silk from the silk farm at Lullingstone Castle in Kent. It has been woven by a London firm into approximately 60 yards of 54 inch satin.

One hundred extra clothing coupons were issued by the B.o.T. to the Princess for her wedding. Her Bridesmaids had an issue of 23 and pages of 10 extra coupons each.

H.R.H.'s hair will be dressed on wedding morning by Mr. Charles Jules Joerin, a London hairdresser who was appointed "hairdresser to the Queen" just before the war. His brother dressed Queen Mary's hair for many years.

In letters of congratulation to H.R.H. many people sent clothing coupons to help with her trousseau. As she has had an official issue, they were returned to the donors with letters of Appreciation.

Wedding Shoes. Ivory Duchesse satin self-lined sandals. They are in one piece, embracing the waist of the foot, with reverse folds on the high instep strap and across the front. These draped sandals wrap the foot, and the open toe, back and side effect, is finished off with a silver buckle studded with small pearls.

Going-Away Shoes. These are made in elasticised mushroom-beige suede, and are a step-in shoe with short outside counter, sweeping round with a high-front appearance, leaving the outside open. The front part of the shoe is finely perforated.

Bridesmaids' Shoes. These are ivory satin ankle-strap sandals with narrow interlaced satin stripping piped with silver kid, and fitted with buckles studded with small pearls.

HARTNELL

Wedding Dress

A Princess Gown of Ivory Duchesse satin, cut on classic lines, with fitted bodice, long tight sleeves and full falling skirt. The broad heart-shaped neckline of the bodice is delicately embroidered with seed pearls and crystal in a floral design. From the pointed waist-line, formed by a girdle of pearl embroidered star flowers, the swirling skirt is gloriously hand embroidered in an exquisite design inspired by the paintings of Botticelli, representing garlands of White York Roses carried out in raised pearls entwined with ears of corn minutely embroidered in crystals and oat-shaped pearls. Alternating between the garlands of roses and wheat and forming a final border around the entire hem of the skirt, are bands of orange blossom and star flowers applique with transparent tulle bordered with seed pearls and crystal.

A full Court train, 15 feet long, of transparent ivory silk tulle attached to the shoulders, is edged with graduated satin flowers, finally forming the deep border at the end of the fan-shaped train. A reversed type of embroidery, as used on the Wedding Gown, is here employed on the train by the use of applique satin star flowers, roses and wheat further encrusted with pearl and crystal embroideries.

An ethereal voluminous Bridal Veil of crisp white tulle is held by a tiara of pearls and diamonds.

Going-Away Ensemble

A simple dress of Love-in-the-Mist blue crepe with cross-over bodice draped to the left hip with three inset panels in the skirt.

A travelling coat of Love-in-the-Mist blue velour cloth with soft revers, rounded shoulders. Inset bands across the coat front are held with three buttons as far as the waist, where the gently flared skirt gives the required fullness and the elegant modern length.

Bridesmaids' Dresses

A diaphanous gown of ivory silk tulle, inspired by the pictures of Winterhalter, Tuxen, and Sir George Hayter, at Buckingham Palace, is designed for each of the eight Bridesmaids. The tight fitting bodice of gathered tulle is shirred down the centre front, and the shoulders are swathed with a deep fichu of pearl spotted tulle bordered with a delicate trail of applique white satin syringa.

The bouffant Victorian skirt of billowing white tulle is scattered with clusters of syringa flowers in applique satin, embroidered especially to repeat a similar effect to the embroidery on the Bridal Train.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

A Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is studying the overseas information program of the United States. The subcommittee includes Senators Wiley, Mundt, Knowland, Fulbright, Gillette, Green and myself as chairman. The primary objective of this study, as set forth in S. Res. 74 (82d Congress) and S. Res. 44 (83d Congress), is to seek means of increasing the effectiveness of the overseas information program.

It has occurred to me that you might be in a position to supply the subcommittee with constructive ideas and suggestions on the use of telecommunications in the information program. The subcommittee would be pleased to have you appear before it for this purpose, if you desire.

If this proposal is agreeable to you, I shall ask Mr. Francis Valeo of the subcommittee staff to make the necessary arrangements with you.

BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSEAS INFORMATION PROGRAMS

STATEMENT BY EDWARD R. MURROW OF THE COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

My name is Edward R. Murrow. I reside at 580 Park Avenue, New York City. I am an employee of the Columbia Broadcasting System, and appear here today at the request of the chairman of your committee. I am a director of the Columbia Broadcasting System, but this is in no sense a corporate statement. It is purely personal.

During the period from 1937 to 1946 I was the European director of the Columbia Broadcasting System with headquarters in London. Subsequently I was, for a period of about a year and a half, vice president in charge of news and public affairs for CBS. For the past five years, I have been employed by that organization as a news broadcaster and analyst. Being conscious that radio commentators have been described, with a degree of accuracy, as men who think with their tonsils and never know what they believe until they hear themselves say it, I have informed your chairman that I have had no considerable firsthand knowledge of the detailed operation of the Voice of America for the past five years. Nevertheless, he graciously bid me to appear here today.

It is my purpose, with your permission, to confine these remarks to the international dissemination of news and information by radio, for it is in this area that my experience, if not competence, resides.

I venture to suggest that the basic problem that confronts us is the operation of a worldwide news service that is accurate, capable of achieving credibility, and designed to reflect with high fidelity American policy and purpose. News is difficult to define. I think it was Mark Twain who said that news is anything that causes a woman to say "My goodness". But news in the international arena can be recognized and measured. It is not advertising, and it is not psychological warfare. It is ascertainable fact, subject to confirmation by varied and independent sources.

An adequate and effective news service operated on behalf of a government must be staffed by competent newsmen, adequately paid. It cannot be the plaything of advertising men or "psychological warriors". The men who direct it must be able to hire and fire as is done in privately financed news organizations. Civil service security for newsmen has not yet produced a competent and flexible news organization.

I am not persuaded that newsmen can function effectively with congressmen looking over one shoulder, or diplomats, or men trained to the foreign service, looking over the other. No one can deny that Congressional scrutiny is essential to our overseas news service, but that scrutiny should perhaps be performed by something in the nature of a permanent watchdog committee which would concern itself primarily with the product, rather than the past personal idiosyncrasies of staff members.

If it is to be a good news service, it must have access to the sum total of news available. It is remarkable, to say the least, that the Voice of America operates without the service of the Associated Press or the United Press. Surely a method could be found to compensate these two great organizations for any economic loss they might sustain in making their services available to their government.

I do not believe that we can or should slant or angle the news broadcasts from this country. We are not operating a controlled society. There are too many alternate sources of information in the western world to permit the successful slanting of news. We should, above everything else, attempt to achieve credibility, for the measure of our success will be the degree to which we are believed. We are not obliged to be first with the news, but we must be right when our voice is compared with other information available.

There is an occupational antipathy between those trained in diplomacy and those trained in news. The diplomats are disposed to say "Don't"; the newsmen are disposed to embarrass the diplomats. I know of no newspaper or radio network that would be likely to trust the post of editor to its diplomatic correspondent. I believe that the Voice of America should be removed from the control and responsibility of the State Department. This suggestion is not meant to imply that the officials of the Department charged with the responsibility are incompetent or inflexible, but the handling of news requires a freedom and flexibility which is, in my experience, foreign to the training and disposition of career men in the foreign service. Nor is this suggestion intended to imply that private radio could adequately discharge this function or responsibility. Perhaps what is required is is a quasi public service corporation whose officials would have editorial access to the editor-in-chief who is, in the last analysis, the President or his spokesman. No matter how able the official news organization, there is no substitute for clear cut and official statements of national policy.

In terms of program content, I am persuaded that the Voice of America can do no more, and should be satisfied with no less, than the holding of an accurate mirror of sound behind events in this country. For example, we could make more widespread use of mature scholars and businessmen from abroad who have spent several months in this country by permitting them to talk freely and frankly to their own fellow countrymen. I would place no prohibition on them except those required by the national security. If they report aspects of American society and civilization that they find unpalatable, so be it. Their fellow countrymen listening to them might be refreshed and uplifted with the knowledge that they enjoy a greater freedom sitting before our microphones than they would in their own country. We profess freedom of speech, let us practice it.

It might be useful to concentrate more on our friends than on our enemies. We are unlikely to create any revolutions by words. But the Russians have laid it down in clear language that their primary purpose, one of their principal articles of faith, is to create division, disunity, and finally conflict, among the allies of the free world. Unless our policy and our purpose is understood, accepted, and approved by our allies, as among good neighbors, we waste our time and our substance in attempting to persuade our enemies.

In this connection, we should devote more effort to arranging for the broadcasting of news and information about this country over the domestic broadcasting facilities of our allies. This is difficult, because they are as reluctant as we to turn over their broadcasting facilities to a foreign power. But, for my own part, I would trade ten minutes of time on the domestic network of France, Turkey, or Great Britain, for ten hours of shortwave broadcasting directed to those countries.

It has been my experience that broadcasters, whether operating in the domestic or international field, are disposed to overestimate the size of their audience. There is certainly sufficient evidence to indicate that the Voice of America has substantial impact behind the Iron Curtain. But this impact, considerable as it is, is not likely to be decisive. But the creation of a more favorable climate of opinion in what is left of the free world might well be of the utmost importance.

There is, of course, implicit in this suggestion an obligation which I believe is now being reasonably well discharged, for the American networks to give adequate opportunity for the expression of news and opinion by representative spokesmen of our allies.

At the moment, primarily for technical reasons, the opportunity for the use of television in the field of international communications is limited. But if opportunity affords, we should make available to our allies a fair cross section of what American television presents, particularly those filmed sequences that portray the average, unglamorized life and doing of American citizens and communities. In all our export, either by voice or by film, we should place little emphasis on swimming pools, expensive motor cars, and riotous night life. This suggestion is made in the interest of proper editorial balance, because most of the people in this country do not have swimming pools, expensive motor cars, or indulge in riotous night life. I dare say, that as the art develops, there will be found both networks and sponsors prepared to make available for foreign distribution film for television, portraying in terms of real people and situations, the way we live and work. Not all of this would be regarded as highly favorable or flattering in allied countries, but the time has surely come when we should cease worrying about that well-worn phrase that anything we may do may possibly give our enemies a propaganda club with which to beat us. Anyone who is reasonably familiar with the output of Radio Moscow is aware that if we do not provide them with a club, they will invent one.

Our problem as I see it, is primarily the reporting through sound and picture what is happening in and to this nation. This is a news job. It should be done by newsmen. It must be done accurately, if for no other reason than that falsification would be found out. The men who do the job, once their loyalty has been established, must be judged by their product, and by nothing else. This major instrument is, after all, called the Voice of America. If that voice sounds at times to be divided and confused--if it reports dissension in the Congress or in the country, I should not be particularly disturbed. We should remember that dissent, division, and criticism are rare commodities in many countries we address.

So far as our export of news is concerned, I should be contented if the reasonably well-informed American citizen could tune his radio set to the shortwave band, listen to a Voice of America broadcast, and say "That's about right; that's the way it is in our country". For it is as reasonable for the citizen to deplore and distrust the angled or slanted news for export, as it is for him to adopt the same attitude in regard to domestic news.

We have no choice but to try to tell the truth about ourselves There is no other way to make the Voice of America more authoratative, more trustworthy; no other way to persuade our allies and the doubters that we pursue a policy which they can endorse, support, and join.

MEMORANDUM

ON

RADIO IN PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE

Certain assertions are elementary as to the use of radio in psychological warfare.

Its purpose is to persuade:

To persuade people behind the Iron Curtain not to resign themselves to tyranny;

To persuade people of Allied countries that American leadership is trustworthy, that it is dedicated to the defense of freedom and the free world, and that the creation of the necessary strength and solidarity can be fulfilled without resort to war;

To persuade people not members of the Western alliances that the defense and furtherance of freedom are activities they can endorse, support and join.

Though the three fields require programs of different shadings and emphasis, these objectives of American policy must be the central message in all three.

Radio cannot persuade without listeners, and its effectiveness is to be measured first by the certainty that it is being heard. This truism is stated because it has not been the dominant consideration in VOA operations. Audience-building activities have been skimped. As a result, audiences are lamentably small in most areas. This is the chief criticism to be leveled against the VOA.

WHO IS THE BOSS OF RADIO?

VOA suffers because the government itself has not recognized that the first master of radio is the listener. He will switch his receiving set on and off according to his free will. The government recognizes the other two masters, the State Department and Congress. The State Department operates and controls VOA for purposes of policy; Congressional interest centers on the provision of funds, and so far as its operations are concerned, most Congressmen want simply that hard-hitting anti-Communist broadcasts are delivered behind the Iron Curtain. Most Congressmen, as well as most officials of the State Department dealing with the Voice, have had no experience in journalism or radio. They do not understand or give sufficient weight to the qualities of credibility, balance and adroitness needed to build audiences or to persuade them.

Most writers at VOA work as though a State Department officer were looking over one shoulder and a Congressman over the other. This is said not to suggest that the State Department and Congress should not be masters of the Voice, for obviously they must be, and will continue to be, no matter how the Voice is reorganized. It is said to stress the existence of the first master, the listener. No power in the State Department and Congress can force him to listen, but the power of either or both of them has induced him not to. The first business of VOA is to make him to want to listen and continue to want to. It can do this with due regard to policy requirements of the State Department and the right of Congress to effective and economical operation. But obedience to the State Department and fear of amateur critique by Congressmen has not provided audiences large enough to promote the success of radio in psychological warfare. A two-fold negative has hung over the Voice. A radio service to succeed in psychological warfare must be positive, courageous and explicit in handling news and commenting on events. Under the State Department it has often been timid and hesitant and in some critical moments it has been altogether silent. Nothing could be better calculated to discourage listening. Regional officers at the State Department, authorized to issue orders to the Voice, frequently say: "Don't", either out of diplomatic caution or to avoid incurring personal responsibility. As listeners the world over can hear the news from other sources, the timidity of VOA passes for weakness. It makes the Voice less authoritative and less trustworthy.

Another aspect of the present organization leads to the skimping of audience-building efforts. That is the handicap imposed by civil service control of VOA personnel and the rate of government pay. The inability of VOA to compete for personnel with private radio has serious results. The VOA staff now includes many men and women whom commercial radio does not want. This does not apply to the foreign language staff, which would not easily find employment elsewhere. But the Voice is short in first-rate writers, creative administrators, good broadcasters and skillful announcers. The shortage of talent is noticeable chiefly in these positions and the upper echelons, though some first-rate persons are struggling against the tide of mediocrity. Most rank and file employees are like rank and file employees elsewhere, possibly somewhat less alert because of the security provided by civil service guarantees, but on the whole imbued with public spirit and competent and willing within the range of the demands made on them. It is hard for VOA to recruit top-flight talent. It takes six months to clear a candidate for employment, and he can only be dismissed for grounds, that is, he cannot be supplanted simply because a more qualified employee is available, as in private employment. The low salaries paid to top-echelon employees make it impossible to recruit anyone who does not regard it a patriotic duty to accept a financial loss in the service of his country. The hazards that have recently been added to working for the State Department and the Voice of America have become so highly dangerous as to counteract any allurement of patriotism.

It is impossible to maintain a high standard of professional operation under these conditions. VOA has not maintained such a standard, and it cannot under existing handicaps. Without the high standard, audience-building is hopeless. Without it, good radio performance in the cold war is lacking and will continue to be lacking.

OUT OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Now for some conclusions. The Voice should be taken out of direct control of the State Department. The overseas service (as well as the domestic service) of the BBC demonstrates that government policy interests can be adequately protected by the maintenance of liaison with the Foreign Office. High-class radio executives do not need to be subject to orders as to every detail in their work. If they know the main lines of policy and the region to which they are broadcasting, they can be trusted to serve the policy without reducing the value of programs. If they are not capable to this extent, executives can be found who are. It will be easier to find good journalists and broadcasters who understand foreign policy than to find good diplomats who understand the intangibles of journalism and radio.

FARTHER AWAY FROM CONGRESS

It is imperative that VOA be freed from day-to-day attack or interference by Congressmen. They know as little or less about broadcasting than the State Department officials now controlling it. VOA must, of course, be subject to Congressional supervision, as are the chiefs of staff, the CIA and other highly professional activities conducted on behalf of the government. But the experts must be allowed to work without constant harrassment from sideline amateurs.

OUT FROM CIVIL SERVICE

VOA should have money enough to employ topnotch broadcasters with knowledge of world affairs who can speak with authority and persuasion as broadcasters. It also must be able to employ the best announcers in the country, for people the world over will judge the nation and the government by the quality of its speech and presentation as well as the message of its Voice. It must have program builders of imagination and experience. These are the present most crying needs of VOA.

It will be difficult to make sure of first-class announcing and writing in the foreign language services, because the supply of such talent is limited. But no effort is being made at present to set minimum standards of presentation in these services. No one at VOA is given training or coaching for microphone duty.

Since English is now as universal as any language, the English-language programs of the Voice should be done with all the professional expertness America can provide. After all, the Voice of America is just that, and America is judged by how it sounds. At present, presentation and much of the program content is not even fourth-rate, and audiences know it.

To meet the needs, VOA should be operated as a semi-public service corporation with freedom to hire and fire promptly for the sake of effective operations. If there is to be enterprise in the propaganda of the Eisenhower Administration, the radio department must have enterprise. The Voice has been paralyzed by the State Department and terrorized by a section of Congress. Now it is pathalogically frightened and lamed. It will take time and patience to restore its morale. It needs to be taken out of government altogether. Most of the present staff can serve a new and revived and lively organization. Those who cannot should be replaced. Fresh talent should be recruited. It is late in the day to be going this. It will delay victory in the cold war to delay it longer.

PUTTING AMERICAN INTERESTS FIRST

Anyone attending a morning staff meeting at the Voice knows that what is known as the Voice of America is actually the separate voices of many foreigners, some of whom are foreign in their political and intellectual interests even if they have American citizenship. That is inescapable, and indeed desirable. But someone chosen for his understanding of American policy and his unquestioning devotion to it should be in charge of the output of every foreign language desk, and this output should be centrally controlled under strict discipline. It is not enough that foreign language output should be anti-Communist. It must be wisely American too. In the OWI no desk was allowed to broadcast material that had not been centrally cleared. Central responsibility should be a cardinal principle in the reorganization.

BUILDING A COMPETENT NEWS SERVICE

The mainstay of an international radio service is news and the discussion of events. The Voice does not have the use of Associated Press and United Press for broadcasting, and must rely on INS (Hearst), the official French agency and Reuters, and the dispatches in New York newspapers. It is inexcusable in this stage of the cold war that AP and UP are not at the service of the nation. Surely some way to compensate them for any gross injury to their financial interests could be established, should it become necessary to appeal to more than their patriotism. This is an urgent consideration, and essential to the campaign to win and hold audiences.

NOT AN ADVERTISERS' JOB

Waging psychological warfare by radio is not simply a job of selling, not even of selling democracy, free enterprise, the evils of the Kremlin conspiracy and Communist economic folly. The selling techniques of advertising are not suitable where an audience is not already in existence. A world audience cannot be built solely by sales talks or held together by them. The audience must be created by services. In international radio these will include editorials and the discussion of ideas and often indeed of the denunciation of falsehoods and evil. But a program dominated by exhortations and tirades, even if drafted by the most proficient ad-writers, will not be listened to, certainly not in most areas. The listener will turn it off and will not turn it on again. He must be given what he finds he wants. The art of persuasion is to give him what he wants so truthfully and so skillfully as to influence his thinking in the process.

TWO KINDS OF APPROACH

In regions under Communist control listeners do want hard-hitting challenges to the Kremlin and answers to Kremlin lies. These listeners will benefit from the hope of ultimate freedom, and will take courage from the news of the build-up of Western strength and the signs of disintegration behind the Iron Curtain. But other regions want their own problems recognized and want to hear about their own relationship to the free world and its collective efforts. They will not listen regularly to the talks that have the most success behind the Iron Curtain. Listeners in other democracies feel competent to form their own opinion about the nature and danger of Communism. They resent being told what to think about this theme. They are, on the other hand, intensely interested in what the United States Government thinks and is doing, and how Washington rates the importance of current events. The broadcasting of news as seen and weighed by the world's strongest and most enlightened nation is sure to command listeners the world over. It needs only to be presented in a manner doing credit to the nation and evidencing its proficiencies.

The principles that apply to programs for Allied countries apply also for lands not immediately part of the world conflict. Here the programs must recognize regional interests and preoccupations. But here, too, the authoritative American presentation and interpretation of news and events will command attention for its own sake. It is sure to be heard if the programs are authentic, authoritative and appealing.

Proposals made to cut down Voice operations to countries not behind the Iron Curtain are hardly realistic. The Voice at present has more regular listeners - i.e., those who listen once to twice a week - in five countries (Germany, France, Austria, Finland and Greece) than there are, all told, short-wave sets behind the Curtain. The figure for the five countries is an estimated 9,830,000 listeners; the short-wave sets behind the Curtain are an estimated 9,500,000.

Radio programs are available to the whole world from Radio Moscow, and for much of the world from the BBC. While broadcasting for these free world or neutral countries will not determine their public opinion, it can inform and influence it. The better the programs, the greater the audience that can be built up, the greater the influence. It should be inconceivable that the United States should write off the estimated 295,000,000 radio listeners outside the Iron Curtain (USA and Canada not included). They should at least be given first-class daily news programs and authoritative interpretation of American policies, both in English and in their own language.

BOTH FUNCTIONS ESSENTIAL

The function of the Voice is not only to keep alive the aspiration to freedom of oppressed and subjugated people, but to hold the free world together and add to its growth. It is not necessary to say which function is more important to ultimate victory in the cold war. Both are essential. Both can only be furthered by a first-class radio and information service. No other means exist to carry the message of American policy to the people of the world.

DOOHER SAID HE HAD OBSERVED A "PATTERN OF SOFTNESS" AND A "LACK OF DEDICATION" IN THE COLD-WAR FIGHT ON THE PART OF POLICY OFFICIALS IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT'S INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION ADMINISTRATION (IIA), WHICH RUNS THE VOICE.

"I'VE FOUND THAT PATTERN OF SOFTNESS IN AT LEAST A HALF DOZEN PLACES IN MY TWO YEARS WITH THE VOICE POF AMERICA," HE

AT ANOTHER POINT, DOOHER ASSAILED WHAT HE TERMED "THE MYTH OF THE BBC (BRITISH BROADCASTING CORPORATION."

THE BBC, HE SAID, IS GENERALLY DESCRIBED AS MORE EFFECTIVE THAN THE "VOICE" BUT IN ASIA, AT LEAST, THE RESPONSE TO BROADCASTS BY BOTH "IS 4 TO 1 UP TO 100 TO 1 IN OUR FAVOR."

THE "VOICE," HE ADDED, "SHOULD B CLEANED UP AND STRENGTHENED."

LONDON, MARCH 19-(AP)-THE BELGRADE RADIO TONIGHT ACCUSED THE GOVERNMENT-SPONSORED BRITISH BROADCASTING CORP. OF "BIASED MISREPRESENTATION" IN ITS SERBO-CROAT LANGUAGE BROADCASTS OF YUGOSLAV PRESIDENT MARSHAL TITO'S CURRENT VISIT TO LONDON.

BBC DENIED THE CHARGE.

QUOTING BORBA AND POLITIKA, TWO SEMI-OFFICIAL YUGOSLAV NEWSPAPERS, THE BELGRADE RADIO SAID BBC REPORTED LAST TUESDAY THAT TITO AND HIS PARTY WERE RECEIVED "IN SILENCE" ON A SIGHTSEEING TOUR IN THE BRITISH CAPITAL.

"BUT THE BRITISH AND OTHER FOREIGN JOURNALISTS WERE ABLE TO SEE AND HEAR FOR THEMSELVES THE GREETING AND APPLAUSE OF THE LONDON PEOPLE--WHICH BBC'S CORRESPONDENT COULD ALSO HAVE HEARD," THE BELGRADE BROADCAST SAID.

"SIMILARLY," IT CONTINUED, "IN ITS TRANSMISSION BBC SPECIALLY STRESSES SECURITY MEASURES WHICH SCOTLAND YARD HAS UNDERTAKEN IN CONNECTION WITH TITO'S STAY IN LONDON, ALTHOUGH THESE ARE ONLY NORMAL IN ANY COUNTRY WHEN HIGH FOREIGN STATESMEN VISIT IT."

BORBA WAS QUOTED AS COMPLAINING THAT BBC IN ITS BROADCASTS BEAMED TO YUGOSLAVIA HAS "NOT TAKEN MUCH PAINS TO BE AN IMPARTIAL REPORTER." POLITIKA WAS QUOTED AS SAYING "IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO ACCEPT SUCH BIASED MISREPRESENTATION OF THE HOSPITALITY SHOWN TITO AND BBC'S INCONSISTENCIES IN RELATION TO THE GENERAL DISPOSITION OF THE BRITISH PUBLIC AND PRESS."

A BBC SPOKESMAN SAID "BBC HAS GIVEN FULL AND SYMPATHETIC COVERAGE TO TITO'S VISIT IN ITS SERBO-CROAT SERVICE AND OTHER SERVICES," ADDING:

WITH NEW YORK A75

FRANKFURT, GERMANY, MARCH 18-(AP)-WILLIAM HEIMLICH, A SPECIAL INVESTIGATOR FOR SENATE PROBERS OF THE U.S. OVERSEAS INFORMATION PROGRAM, SAID TODAY HE RESIGNED AS DIRECTOR OF THE AMERICAN RADIO STATION RIAS IN BERLIN IN 1949 IN A DISPUTE OVER POLICY.

HEIMLICH SAID A REPORT CARRIED IN A NEW YORK TIMES DISPATCH SAYING HE HAD QUIT UNDER CHARGES OF INCOMPETENCY IS "A LITTLE RIDICULOUS IN VIEW OF THE RECORD." HE ADDED:

"I RESIGNED AS DIRECTOR OF RIAS IN SEPTEMBER, 1949, BECAUSE I WANTED IT TO CONTINUE TO BE A HARD FIGHTING STATION AND SOME LITTLE PEOPLE IN THE U.S. HIGH COMMISSION WANTED TO PULL ITS TEETH.

"IT WAS A DISPUTE OVER POLICY AND THE POLICY I ADVOCATED WAS EVENTUALLY UPHELD, BUT I HAD TO LEAVE TO GET IT ENFORCED. TWO OFFICIALS WHO FOUGHT ME ON THE POLICY ARE NO LONGER WITH THE HIGH COMMISSION."

HEIMLICH, A COLONEL OF INTELLIGENCE IN GEN. EISENHOWER'S SUPREME ALLIED HEADQUARTERS IN WORLD WAR II, WAS APPOINTED DIRECTOR OF RIAS IN FEBRUARY, 1948. UNDER HIS DIRECTION THE STATION OPERATED BY THE U.S. GOVERNMENT WAS DEVELOPED INTO ONE OF THE WEST'S MOST POWERFUL COLD WAR WEAPONS.

HEIMLICH SAID HE CAME TO EUROPE AT THE REQUEST OF THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS SUB-COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE U.S. OVERSEAS INFORMATION PROGRAM IN GERMANY, AUSTRIA AND TRIESTE.

HIS RESIGNATION AS RIAS DIRECTOR IN 1949 CAME FOUR MONTHS AFTER GEN. LUCIUS D. CLAY, HIS CHIEF BACKER IN RIAS' PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE OPERATIONS, STEPPED OUT AS MILITARY GOVERNOR AND JOHN J. MCCLOY CAME TO GERMANY AS THE FIRST U.S. HIGH COMMISSIONER.

HEIMLICH, A NATIVE OF OHIO, IS NOW ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE GRAY MANUFACTURING COMPANY, AN ELECTRONICS PRODUCER AT HARTFORD, CONN.

"I DIDN'T ASK FOR THIS ASSIGNMENT TO COME ABROAD, THE SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE REQUESTED ME TO UNDERTAKE IT," HE SAID.

"I'M NOT BEING PAID ANY SALARY ON THE TRIP, BUT THE SUB-COMMITTEE IS MEETING MY TRAVEL EXPENSES.

"I'M TRYING TO TAKE A MEASUREMENT OF OUR ENTIRE PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAM IN SOME KEY AREAS OF EUROPE--I'M NOT INTERESTED IN PARTICULAR INDIVIDUALS.

"MY PURPOSE IS TO SEE WHETHER OUR PROGRAM IS KEEPING OUR FRIENDS FRIENDLY AND WINNING OVER ENEMIES AS FRIENDS."

HEIMLICH AND HIS WIFE, CHRISTINA OLSEN, A FORMER GERMAN ACTRESS, WHO HAS BECOME AN AMERICAN CITIZEN, WERE CLEARED BY THE CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY AND THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION FOR THE TRIP.

"I HAD A TALK WITH ALLEN DULLES (CIA DIRECTOR) BEFORE I LEFT," SAID HEIMLICH.

"ANY CHARGE ABOUT MY COMPETENCY OUGHT TO BE REFERRED TO THE SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE, WHICH KNOWS MY RECORD. I HAD THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE RATINGS FROM THE GOVERNMENT WHILE I WAS IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE.

"IN 1945 AND 1946, I WAS CHIEF OF INTELLIGENCE IN THE AMERICAN MILITARY COMMAND IN BERLIN. THEN I WENT ON CIVILIAN STATUS AND WAS AN ADVISOR TO GENERAL FRANK H. HOWLEY, THE U.S. COMMANDANT."

"IN 1947," HEIMLICH CONTINUED, "GEN. CLAY ASKED ME TO TAKE OVER RIAS AND FIGHT BACK AGAINST THE COMMUNISTS. IT WAS A LITTLE TEA KETTLE OF A STATION, WITH A 20,000 WATT TRANSMITTER BROADCASTING ONLY FOUR HOURS DAILY.

"WE INSTALLED A 100,000-WATT TRANSMITTER AND WENT ON THE AIR 24 HOURS A DAY. I DIRECTED IT THROUGH THE BERLIN BLOCKADE.

HICKENLOOPER NAMED THE INVESTIGATOR AS WILLIAM HEIMLICH, OF COLUMBUS, OHIO. HE DID NOT SAY WHO WAS AFTER HIM.

HICKENLOOPER SAID HEIMLICH BECAME A CONTROVERSIAL FIGURE AS HEAD OF THE U.S. BERLIN RADIO STATION, POPULARLY STYLED "RIAS" (CAPS) FOR RADIO IN AMERICAN SECTOR, IN THE LATE 1940'S, AND "DID A GOOD JOB, BUT HAD TO STEP ON A LOT OF TOES TO DO IT, AND NOW THE WOLVES ARE OUT TO GET HIM--TO DISCREDIT HIM."

HE SAID HE DID SO ON GROUNDS THE STATION WAS BEING RUN UNECONOMICALLY AND "WITH A HIGH HAND," AND ADDED THAT HE IS AMAZED THAT HEIMLICH NOW IS INVESTIGATING RIAS FOR THE SUBCOMMITTEE.

SEN. FULBRIGHT (D-ARK), SENIOR DEMOCRAT ON THE SUBCOMMITTEE AND ITS FORMER CHAIRMAN, SAID "HEIMLICH WAS PICKED BY SEN. HICKENLOOPER, AND I KNOW NOTHING ABOUT HIM EXCEPT THAT SEN. HICKENLOOPER REPORTED HE WOULD BE A VERY CAPABLE MAN FOR THE POSITION."

OVERSEAS INFORMATION PROGRAMS OF THE UNITED STATES

JANUARY 30, 1953.—Ordered to be printed

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following

INTERIM REPORT

[Pursuant to S. Res. 74, 82d Cong.]

I. INTRODUCTION

Senate Resolution 74, passed on June 30, 1952, authorized the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof duly designated by the chairman, in conjunction with two other Senators designated by the President of the Senate, to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of the objectives, operation, and effectiveness of existing foreign information programs of the United States Government.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations appointed Senator Fulbright chairman of the subcommittee. Other members designated from the Foreign Relations Committee were Senators Gillette, Wiley, and Hickenlooper, and from the Senate at large, Senators Benton and Mundt. The subcommittee was bipartisan in character, consisting of three Democrats and three Republicans. Senate Resolution 74 called for the subcommittee to report to the Senate prior to January 31, 1953.

It was not possible for the subcommittee to hold meetings before November 1952. Members of the staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, however, held many conferences with officials concerned with the information program and with consultants whom the subcommittee retained. The Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress gave valuable assistance in preparing background material.

Several confidential staff studies were circulated and three studies were published as committee prints: (1) General Background Information; (2) Great Britain's Information Program; and (3) The Soviet Union's Propaganda Program. The subcommittee asked for special reports from all heads of missions and obtained information from Americans living abroad who were in a position to comment on the effectiveness of our information programs. Senator Wiley visited Western Europe in connection with this and other subcommittee assignments and observed information programs in several countries. Senator Benton also made a visit to Western Europe to secure information for the subcommittee. This information, the staff studies, and testimony at the brief executive hearings held in November 1952 were available to members who were able to make personal inspections abroad in late November and December 1952.

Senator Fulbright visited a number of posts in Western Europe, Senator Gillette in the Middle East, and Senator Hickenlooper in the Far East. On these visits it was possible to check the information obtained from the sources mentioned above and by personal observation to obtain additional knowledge about American overseas information activities. Each of the members who traveled abroad has filed reports with the subcommittee.

On the basis of the information thus obtained, the following recommendations are submitted:

II. Recommendations

1. It is recommended that the subcommittee be continued in operation until June 30, 1953. If thus continued by the Senate, the subcommittee would be able—

(a) To hold hearings based upon the personal studies of members of the subcommittee;

(b) To explore further the questions and problems raised in this study;

(c) To undertake field investigations in Latin America;

(d) To continue to collect information on the program and carry out the purposes as set forth in Senate Resolution 74.

2. It is further recommended that $25,000, in addition to funds remaining available, be authorized for use to defray expenses of the committee in carrying on the studies required by Senate Resolution 74.

III. General Conclusions

1. The subcommittee believes that the overseas information services and programs of the United States and private agencies are very important and that they must and can be strengthened. In a world beset by a mighty contest of ideologies—which our opponents could all too easily shift to all-out military conflict—it is essential that the United States Government take all reasonable and proper steps to see that the people of the world know the principles for which we stand.

A successful information program will permit the true nature of our purposes and ideals to be contrasted with those of communism and will contribute to the unity and strength of the free world.

2. The subcommittee is giving attention to the question of the best way of realizing these aims. The assumption upon which the organization and role of the overseas information and education activities has been based in the past has been that there should be an official program, centrally designed and administered, and contributing to foreign peoples' understanding of America's objectives for world peace and progress.

This assumption was in many ways an outgrowth of information programs developed during the war. It was no doubt influenced somewhat by congressional action, in law and in appropriations. The assumption that there should be a centrally directed world-wide program, however, has been responsible for a cumbersome, extensive, and rigid bureaucratic framework and jargon and has prevented or at least understressed the use of other, and perhaps better, methods of operation in a very complex and delicate field. The trend in the past has been toward building up, in Washington and New York, large media divisions, which produce in finished and semifinished form quantities of information materials for official distribution and broadcast abroad. The present administration of the international information and education program seems to be cognizant of this problem, and there is some evidence that the program is being readapted to more realistic present needs. The committee is interested to know, for example, that the State Department has developed plans to submit its program to Congress on a country basis—that is, to request appropriations upon definite plans designed for each country in which it operates, and this is one proposal which merits careful study. It is also giving its public affairs officers in each country greater authority and responsibility in tailoring programs to fit more nearly the needs therein.

The proper concept, however, involves much more than merely organizational or budgetary aspects. What is involved is the basic conception of the real role, character, and limitations of official foreign information activities, and the selection of qualified personnel who can administer such activities at home or abroad.

The first principle upon which a determination of this role ought to be based is that tactics and methods must vary with local psychological factors. One of the few generalities which can be derived from this principle is that the more highly developed a free country is, and the greater is its degree of political maturity and general education, the less effective are the official information activities of a foreign government in that country. (Even this general rule has its exceptions, however, as in Berlin and Vienna, where, because they are within the shadow of the iron curtain, there is more tolerance of official United States Government information, which is itself a comforting manifestation of United States presence).

Furthermore, as regards Western Europe, for example, this principle may mean greater emphasis upon personal contact, persuasion, and explanation. Our materials must be based upon facts, figures, texts, and other authoritative and unimpeachable materials which illustrate the character of the United States, its people, its institutions, its spiritual and moral principles, and its fundamental position and policies on all important issues.

The acceptance of this principle would lessen—at least in some areas—the dangers of overbelligerency and amateurishness. Americans residing abroad, who are competent observers, report that some of our information services seemed to talk down to peoples who have had as much practical experience as ourselves and who therefore resent the implication of superiority and preaching. In highly developed countries, therefore, there may be an opportunity to revamp our official information activities and make our program more effective.

Further emphasis in the field of cultural relations and educational exchange in the broadest sense could well increase the feeling of kinship and identity of interest between the United States and other countries of the free world. America must avoid appearing to be too much present physically in terms of power, overseas, and at the same time seeming to be distant and remote on the plane of common cultural and spiritual values.

3. No matter how effective an information program may be, it cannot be a substitute for policy. The United States is judged abroad by its actions much more than by words. Words may help a people to understand action, but they are no substitute for policy. Thus a vigorous and clear-cut foreign policy enunciated boldly and simply by the highest ranking officials of the United States can do as much or more than large appropriations for information.

Likewise, irresponsible or thoughtless statements by high officials or domestic action taken by Government agencies without consideration of its information impact abroad, can do tremendous damage to the foreign policy interests of the United States.

4. While information is no substitute for policy, it is essential that the link between policy and information be close. There may be cases in which the potential information impact of a particular policy decision may be so severe as to justify a modification of the proposed policy. There must be, therefore, the closest coordination between policy-making officials and information officers both in Washington and in the field, and a recognition on the part of our highest officials of the importance of our information program.

Thus, in summary, the subcommittee believes that there is a wide area for improvement of our information program. First, we might well give more attention to the development of local activities on a country-by-country basis, which stimulate and work through foreign governments where practicable, as well as local individuals and groups who are acting because of concern for the liberties of their own country in the cold war. Second, we should give more attention to developing the fuller potentiality of those heretofore relatively unexploited programs involving libraries, exchanges, book publications, cultural relations activities, and other relatively long-range activities, which have frequently been more effective in creating understanding and support for America than the mass media.

IV. Problems for Further Consideration

On the basis of information thus far collected by the subcommittee during its on-the-spot investigations of the information operations in Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East, it is possible to list a number of problems which require further examination. When these matters have been examined and studies have been made of our programs in Latin America, the subcommittee will be in a position to make the firm "recommendations for necessary appropriations or legislation as it may deem desirable," as required by Senate Resolution 74.

The committee urges interested individuals, organizations, and executive agencies to focus their attention on these problems phrased in the form of questions, since it expects to examine these matters in hearings in the near future.

A. ORGANIZATION OF THE INFORMATION PROGRAM

1. Has the United States given enough attention at a sufficiently high governmental level to the organization and execution of information policy and strategy? Have the activities of executive agencies operating in this field been adequately coordinated and clearly defined in Washington and in the field?

2. Should overseas information programs of the United States, both long and short range (which include some 40 percent of the personnel of the Department of State), be continued organizationally within the Department? If so, is the relationship between foreign policy and information operations sufficiently close? If the information programs should be separated from the Department of State, how is it possible to maintain a close relationship between policy and information?

B. ADMINISTRATION AND PERSONNEL

1. What steps can be taken to enlarge the pool of qualified media and area specialists who would be available to man the information program of this Government?

2. Should additional authority and responsibility be delegated to country or regional public affairs officers and what effect would such delegation have on the size or operations in the United States?

3. Could the information program be made more effective by increasing the interchange between field and home officers, and between regular Foreign Service officers and media specialists? To what extent is the principle of rotation of officers applicable in the field of information?

4. Is it necessary to continue separate information operations in the Mutual Security Agency and in the Technical Cooperation Administration in view of the integration of their activities in the field with those of the State Department?

5. Have American public affairs officers abroad been so much involved in administrative duties that they have not had sufficient time for their information activities?

6. Has a maximum effort been made to achieve the strongest possible security with respect to personnel in information programs?

7. Should the scale of expenditures for the information program be increased, decreased, or continued at about the current level? Has every effort been made to secure the maximum constructive use of United States appropriations and of counterpart currency used in information programs?

8. Have our programs in the past given proper relative emphasis, monetarily and administratively, to the effectiveness of the various media in particular countries? Should there be a change in emphasis? If so, in what direction?

9. Could the information programs be strengthened by creating an inspector corps independent of the Department of State? If so, to whom might such a corps be made responsible?

10. Is the process of evaluating the effectiveness of information programs being efficiently carried out or could it be improved?

11. In view of the importance of personal contacts in developing friendly relations abroad, should representational allowances of public affairs officers be increased?

12. Are proper steps being taken to make sure that our ambassadors understand the importance of our information programs to American foreign policy and their role in connection therewith?

13. Are Allied Governments and intergovernmental agencies doing their part in informing both their own and other free peoples of the common programs of the United States and its friends on behalf of collective security?

C. RADIO

1. Are Voice of America short-wave broadcasts to Western Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East as good as they should be from the point of view of the strength of the signal and the quality of the programs? Are steps being taken to improve the strength of the signal? Are present short-wave programs to non-iron-curtain countries justified?

2. Are we getting maximum constructive results from short-wave broadcasts to iron curtain countries? Are personnel engaged in Voice operations chosen with due regard to their background and skills?

3. To what degree should the Voice of America be subject to State Department control?

4. What are the advantages and disadvantages of decentralization of the operations of the Voice of America?

5. What are the possibilities of using television as a method of giving effect to American information programs?

D. PRESS SERVICES AND PAMPHLETS

1. Can the official press services supplied in foreign countries by the Department of State be improved? Should they be expanded, curtailed, or revamped? Is too much emphasis placed on mass distribution of materials?

2. Are the pamphlets now being published by the United States, and distributed abroad free of charge, justified in terms of cost and results?

E. MOTION PICTURES

1. Would the official American film program be strengthened by increasing the number of films produced abroad?

2. Is the technical quality of American official films as good as should be the case?

3. Is the motion picture industry in the United States doing all that it can to reduce to a minimum the number of films shown abroad which might harm the national interests of the United States? What means can be devised for improved liaison between Government agencies and motion picture companies in order to assure better understanding of the problems of each?

F. INFORMATION CENTERS (LIBRARIES)

1. Are American libraries and information centers abroad effective in supplying information to foreigners about the United States? Are they adequate in size and in scope?

2. What more can be done to encourage the translation and distribution of American books and magazines abroad?

G. EXCHANGES

1. Should the exchange programs now being carried on by several Government agencies and a number of private institutions be more closely coordinated than is now the case?

2. What steps might be taken to increase the effectiveness of existing exchange programs? Should they be expanded? If so, where should increased emphasis be placed—on students, leaders, or others?

3. Do we tend to view exchange programs too much as devices to export American know-how and not enough as methods for the United States to receive information and knowledge from abroad?

4. In connection with the military exchange under the Mutual Security Program, are we doing all we can to acquaint the trainees with the cultural and political aspects of American life?

H. OTHER QUESTIONS

1. In view of the numbers of American troops stationed abroad is the Department of Defense doing all it can and should do to see that each American soldier is a good ambassador for his country?

2. Has adequate effort been made to stimulate America's civic-minded individuals and organizations to expand their roles in a people-to-people's information program?

3. Are the advisory commissions achieving the maximum results intended by the Congress when it set them up?

In conclusion, the committee wishes to emphasize again that it has accumulated a great deal of information on each of the questions raised above. It does not yet feel, however, that it has made the "full and complete study and investigation" of our overseas information programs as required by Senate Resolution 74. By the end of the current fiscal year the committee believes it will be able to file the comprehensive report requested and make the "recommendations for necessary appropriations or legislation" that may be needed in the interests of the United States Government.

O

Sam Jones
Senate Foreign Relations Sub-Committee study of Overseas Information Programs.
3/19/ 53

The Public Hearing phase of this investigation into "the objectives, operations, and effectiveness of existing information programs of the United States government"is nearing completion. Staff experts will then analyze and correlate testimony for the guidance of the Sub-Committee in making its recommendations relative to appropriations or legislation.

(The Sub-Committee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate derived its authority from S. Res.84, 82d Congress; extended by S. Res. 44 in 83d.)

An additional purpose of the investigation has been a search for ways and means to co-ordinate the activities of the various executive agencies involved in the multiple aspects of foreign information and exchange. There is tacit admission now that in the absence of a clear-cut foreign policy, such an objective is impossible to attain. There is also recognition now that policy and information must be correlated to present an harmonious picture of the U.S., its methods and objectives. Instances of conflict between statements of diplomats and information officers are especially feared as potential factors in causing tremendous damage to the foreign policy interests of the United States.

The two main agencies of coordination at present are (1) The Psycholigical Strategy Board and (2) The Secretary of State together with the Interdepartmental Psychological Operations Coordinating Committee. The demarcation of authority is NOT been clearly defined.

The preponderance of the government's overseas information is carried on by the International Information Administration of the Department of State. In 1948 (under the Smith-Mundt Act) the major emphasis was placed on telling America's story. ("The approach, in effect, was that of a national advertising campaign" - Staff Study No 1) Experience disclosed that the method sometimes overwhelmed and confused peoples elsewhere and tended to create resentments.

Since June 1950 (Korea) programs have been designed to deter further aggression to help maintain cohesion in non-communist countries and promote confidence in the free nations' ability to meet any eventuality. An elaborate system was established to produce specialized programs for each country and area, which would be suitable in content and technique for the various social and economic groups in each respective geographical field. (!!!!)

The current investigation began with the premise that there is a wide area for improvement in our of our information program. In its report, scheduled for completion before June 30, may suggest legislation or appropriations to facilitate (1) more attention to the development of local activities on a country-by-country basis to bring foreign nationals to a better understanding of the liberties of their respective countries and to coordinate their individual and group efforts on an international scale. (2) Greater stress in the relatively unexploited fields of promotion of libraries, exchanges, book publications, cultural relation activities and other long-range projects.

When the hearings end, about 20 witnessess will have expressed their opinions and offered suggestions (See attached list). Introductory statements by witnesses are customary and become a part of the record. Mr. Murrow will probably be questioned on how he thinks non-governmental radio programs and TV can be co-ordinated with Information activities - if at all - or what part should be undertaken and developed by private initiative in this vast and delicate psychological field. (An opening statement on this or any other related subject will be welcomed.) Another probable line of questioning is the possibility of using TV to make information programs more effective.

Mexico City—"Television will be operating in the black by the end of this year," declared Don Emilio Azcarraga yesterday in an interview at his office in Mexico City's imposing new Televicentro. "We are building up set circulation and viewing audiences steadily and we hope to be able to revise our rate schedule by the end of the summer so that we may pass the break-even point sometime before the end of 1953," he added. The present rate structure at XEW-TV lists a half-hour of "A" time at 800 pesos, or about $100, plus a small additional facilities charge. However, lest Madison Avenue time-buyers hop the next plane for Mexico City, the rate is exactly double for shows produced outside the borders of the country. Thus a filmed or kined show produced in the States and shown down here on XEW-TV, plus being relayed across the country by XEQ-TV for the same time charge, will command a tariff of 1,600 pesos per half-hour. Even so, a half-hour of "A" time on a cabinet level with a view to making it a permanent part of the government.

The recommendation came from Judge Justin Miller, chairman of the board and general counsel of NARTB and a member of the U. S. Advisory Commission on Information. The commission is charged with the duty of appraising the international information administration and advising both the Congress and the secretary of state concerning its operation.

The Voice of America is one of the major projects of IIA.

Establish On Cabinet Level

"Our commission has concluded," he said, "that there is no hope of carrying out the intent of the law (Smith-Mundt Act) so long as the operation remains in the State Department. In order to challenge the thinking of Congress we recommend that IIA be lifted out of the department and established on cabinet level. We think that unless this is done the job cannot be performed as Congress intended."

In recommending a permanent IIA Miller said, "We see no possibility of escape from the obvious, continuing need for an affirmative, positive program to advise the people of the world concerning our good will, our honest and peaceful intentions."

He added that "Congress should now assume a larger degree of responsibility for working out a solution to the problem. This cannot be done by the devastating methods of a prosecuting attorney. . . . Provision should be made for a liaison contact with Congress which can come only from a committee especially charged with the task. . . ."

All the consideration discussed by Miller, he said, argue for a "permanent joint committee of Congress which can concern itself with the proper planning and continuing development of a highly important agency of the government; equally important as the production of atomic energy or of the control of international trade and commerce, or of governmental developments to which similar Congressional attention is being given. . . ."

Criticizes N. Y. Operation

Speaking of the Voice specifically he cited as "impossible" the idea "that our information program can be conceived, written and delivered" from a New York headquarters. No matter how well-intentioned such a method may be it is bound to fail, he added. "This is the essential weakness of the Voice of America. It would be hard to devise a less effective information service than one headquartered in New York City whose programs are hatched in the brains of a group of intellectuals who have been trained for service in the State Department, translated into 40 languages by a group of dispossessed people, and broadcast indiscriminately to all nations."

Programs, Miller told the committee which is probing the efficacy of the Voice and other facets of the international information program, should "be prepared in lay language understandable by the people, avoiding the professional mystery and the government gobbledegook which so frequently destroys the effect of the message."

Judge Miller said that for five years the commission of which he is a member has been pointing out to the State Department the inadequacies of the program, with emphasis on the Voice, and said that "generally speaking, the department has either disregarded our recommendations or acted upon them reluctantly, indeed. There has been some open hostility and a large measure of indifference to the whole operation; there has been an apparent hope that the information operation is a mere passing phase and will soon pass out of existence; there has been continuing insistence that the whole operation must be whipped into conformance with the slow-moving 'tell-them-nothing' administrative policies and practices of the foreign service which apparently dominates policy and administration, not only in the field but in Washington."

New Easter TV Film Released To Stations

"I Beheld His Glory," a new filming of the Easter story, is being released to all television stations this week by the National Council of the Churches of Christ for showing during the Good Friday, Saturday and Easter Sunday week-end. in charge of network programs.

During a special press conference, in the network's Studio 41, at which representatives of some 21 colleges and universities were in attendance, the scope of the series, entitled "The Search," was outlined.

Each program, as described, will be told from the point of view of individuals affected by, or participating in, the project. Roy Lockwood, self-styled newcomer to the medium, will be producer of the series.

Following a brief welcome to the college dignitaries and the press, given by J. L. Van Volkenburg, president of CBS TV, the outline of the new 26-week series was described by Robinson, Sig Mickelson, director of news and public affairs, David Jacobson, director of press, and by Lockwood, from the point of view of CBS TV.

Will Commence In April

Summed up, the new project will commence its activities in April, with expectation of having pilot films produced within a month, and to have the full machinery in action towards the end of May.

It is expected that eight weeks will be required for the completion of each story, from the time the story is chosen, until final film editing is done in New York.

In his remarks, concerning the new series, Mickelson said: "It is our firm conviction that 'The Search' meets the strictest tests of good educational television. We are looking forward to cooperation with the universities of the United States: we realize that we can't work with all of them at the outset of this project, but we hope that we may be able to make 'The Search' sufficiently successful and sufficiently long-lived so that we may some time broaden the scope to cover all the major institutions of higher learning in the United States."

Schools Represented

Schools of higher learning who had representatives present included: Pennsylvania, Michigan, Chicago, Minnesota, Iowa, Louisville, North Carolina, Dartmouth, State College of Agriculture and Engineering, Raleigh; Ohio State, MIT, Cornell, Columbia. Other schools to participate in the series include California, USC, CIT, Colorado School of Mines, Utah, Washington, Northwestern and Penn State.

Following remarks concerning the new series by college representatives, the question and answer period elicited the facts that the program is expected to be scheduled for viewing on late Sunday afternoons, starting probably in October, and that, while sponsorship is not presently being considered, the possibility exists that with 100 per cent approval of the colleges and universities, a sponsor could be considered.

THE IMPLICATIONS OF THE PHYSICAL SCIENCES FOR THE WORLD OF TODAY

Sir John D. Cockcroft, O.M., K.C.B., O.B.E., F.R.S.
Master, Churchill College, Cambridge

We are experiencing today a very rapid development of technology, based on developments in pure science two decades earlier. These developments of technology are in turn feeding back new methods, new instruments to help to promote new developments in basic science leading to a general acceleration of the pace of scientific and technological development as a whole.

The development of nuclear physics in the 1930s, culminating in the discovery of fission, led directly to Fermes atomic pile, and from this to the giant nuclear power stations which are already generating billions of kilowatt hours a year of electricity. Nuclear power is still in the development stage, a stage characterised by a steady and substantial fall in capital costs of the power stations, and the growing knowledge of the technology of fuel cycles, which should steadily reduce fuel costs. The best forecast we can now make predicts that nuclear power will break even with conventional power in Britain in the late 1960s. U.S. forecast predicts nuclear power costs at eight Mils in the late 1960s in the United States, and this will be competitive in some high power cost areas in that country. These figures are strongly dependent on capital charges and favourable load factors.

The development of power from fusion is at present at the same stage as fission power 20 years ago. The fundamental problem is that of containment of the hot plasma, and this is dependent on the development of methods of overcoming instabilities of various kinds which are leading to large losses of energy from the plasma.

Plasma physics may result in methods of direct conversion of heat to electricity, and is already being applied to the propulsion of rockets.

The solid state physics of the 1930s has led to equally important developments - even more important today commercially than the application of fission. The development of transistors has revolutionised electronics and made possible new applications, such as very fast computers, which would have been impossible with vacuum tubes. We have also now available semi-conductors for radiation, detection, refrigeration, and a wide range of other uses. Electronic devices for the conversion of heat to electricity have achieved efficiencies of 17 per cent and should do better in future. Fuel cells for the conversion of chemical energy to electrical energy are fast developing.

The applications of the techniques of physics - X-ray crystallography combined with high speed computing - is making possible the unravelling of the structure of large molecules of biological interest, such as haemoglobin, proteins, D.N.A. This borderline of the physical and biological sciences is making extremely rapid progress and this may have profound consequences for the human race.

The discoveries in chemistry and biochemistry research and the new developments in chemical technology seem to have a shorter time lag than in physics. The antibiotics, sulphur drugs, plant hormones, synthetic weed killers have transformed medical practice and the expectation of life. The scientific aids to agriculture have done something to reduce the balance of increasing food production. The major problem for the end of the century is to find means of keeping food and population in balance.

A still more important problem is the control of the powers of destruction which the developments of physical science have placed in the hands of statesmen.

PROBLEMS OF NEW STATES

W. Arthur Lewis
Principal, University College of the West Indies

The basic economic objective of new states is to achieve self-sustaining growth, of, say, at least two per cent per head per year. This requires devoting a quarter of national income to growth, of which half is for maintaining public services and half for net capital formation.

Current expenditure on public services (excluding defence) needs about 12 per cent of national income (education 3 per cent, public health 2 per cent, economic services 3 per cent, administration and welfare 4 per cent). These services are as necessary to economic development as is investment in physical capital; they may be regarded as investment in people.

In most underdeveloped countries, the proportion of national income devoted to growth is nearer 15 than 25 per cent. In other words, the problem is to reduce the share of personal consumption in national income from 85 to 75 per cent, not overnight, but over a reasonably short period, say two decades.

THE ROLE OF TAXATION

Countries which are now developed have all had to make this transition during their "industrial revolutions" or "take-off periods". With the exception of the U.S.S.R., they effected their adjustment through the rise to wealth and political power of a capitalist class. The capitalists used their newly-won political power to create the modern framework of public services, and they used their wealth for productive investment. Since capitalists save a larger proportion of their income than any other class, the relative growth of the capitalist class automatically increased the proportion of national income saved.

This process is necessarily slow, except where it is accelerated by immigration of foreign capitalists. In most underdeveloped countries today the pace is set not by capitalists but by nationalist politicians, who, even where they have no ideological objection to capitalism, are seeking a more rapid path.

Taxation provides a more rapid alternative. If 20 per cent of national income is raised in taxes, of which 12 per cent is for current expenditure on public services, the remaining 8 per cent is available (along with, say, 5 per cent of national income saved privately) for financing public and private capital investment. About a half of capital investment is in the public sector anyway (railways, roads, ports, telecommunications, electricity, water, schools etc.) And the half which is in the private sector (houses, agriculture, etc.) looks to public mortgage financing for much of its funds.

In most underdeveloped countries taxation now takes nearer 10 than 20 per cent of national income. The nationalist politicians' problem, in getting from 10 to 20 per cent, is neither economic nor administrative; it is primarily a problem of achieving successful political leadership.

THE NEW NATIONALISTS

Today the drive for economic development is led not by the capitalist but by the 'new nationalist' political leader. The new nationalist differs from the old in two respects - he is ashamed, and he is leftist. Whereas the old nationalist sees his country through romantic spectacles, the new nationalist sees poverty, illiteracy and disease, of which he is ashamed, and which he wishes to eliminate. And whereas the old nationalist is usually reactionary in internal politics, the new nationalist vows to serve the common man, and is anxious to spread education and to increase the peasant's output, - basic conditions of economic progress.

The old nationalists, who are still numerous, do little for economic growth. New nationalists can make their countries self-sustaining within two decades, but only if they avoid a number of pitfalls.

First, in countries which are not homogeneous nations in the nineteenth century sense, political power passes easily to language maniacs, religious obscurantists or military adventurers, and the prospects of democracy are poor. A new nationalist succeeds in acquiring and maintaining power in this milieu only if he has great skill in party management, combined with great charismatic appeal.

Secondly, if a revolutionary is to hold power, he must put into office men whom he can trust. On the other hand, if he is to achieve his economic objectives, office holders must also be competent. Only a strong leader can fulfil both these requirements simultaneously.

Thirdly, at their present levels, all underdeveloped countries need some foreign capital and much foreign know-how. However, independence movements have usually been active in working up a popular agitation against foreigners. It takes psychological skill for the new nationalist to make the transition from anti-foreign propaganda to programmes offering incentives to foreign investors.

Fourthly, if a new nationalist achieves power mainly with trade union support, he has difficulty in restraining consumption to provide resources for economic growth. Nationalists whose support derives mainly from the villages fare better.

With the pitfalls so numerous, it is not surprising that only a handful of nationalist revolutions result in accelerated economic growth.

FOREIGN AID

Foreign aid (loans, investments, or grants) provides a breathing space during which additional resources can be devoted to economic growth without restraining personal consumption. However, where foreign aid is used as an excuse for not making the necessary domestic effort, it carries the country no nearer to self-sustaining growth. If foreign aid is to be self-liquidating, it must be made proportional to progress achieved in enlarging the share of national output devoted to economic growth.

ENERGY IN THE UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO INDIA

Homi J. Bhabha, F.R.S.
Chairman, Indian Atomic Energy Commission

It is widely recognised that the underdeveloped countries of the world will have a rapidly rising demand for energy as they industrialise their economies. This paper discusses the rough targets of energy consumption that these countries must aim at in order to achieve standards of living comparable with those in the industrially advanced areas. The availability of conventional sources of energy in various areas of the world is examined. It is found that the underdeveloped areas are, unfortunately, relatively poor with regard to reserves of conventional power. It is shown that these reserves might be insufficient even to reach the levels of development of the industrially advanced countries today. Thus, recourse will have to be made everywhere to nuclear energy sooner or later.

The energy situation in India is examined both from the long term and immediate points of view. The availability of nuclear fuels, and the need to go over in due course to a thorium cycle, are discussed. It is shown how, in certain regions, nuclear power is required, and is economically comparable with conventional power even today. There are several such regions in India with large interconnected power systems very far from coal-fields and with insufficient hydro power at hand. The demand for power in these areas, (as indeed in the country as a whole) is doubling every five years or so. If thermal power is installed to meet this rapid rise in demand, it would be very expensive; moreover it would involve additional heavy burdens on an already strained transport system. Fairly large size nuclear power stations in these regions could be installed to run at base load and to deliver power at rates comparable with those from conventional stations. India is, therefore, embarking on a substantial nuclear power programme.

Nuclear power also has an immediate bearing on the power situation of those underdeveloped countries which do not possess any conventional fuels. In such cases, it may well be more attractive to import nuclear rather than conventional fuels for producing the same amount of electrical energy, and therefore additional power capacity could be based on nuclear rather than conventional sources of energy. The example of Ceylon is discussed in this connection.

In conclusion, an account is given of the Indian Atomic Energy programme and developments at Trombay.

THE POSSIBILITY OF ACHIEVING ENERGY AUTARKY BY USE OF BREEDER REACTORS

Breeder reactors are unique in that, in principle, they can be fueled with the residual uranium and thorium found in almost all granitic rocks. An energy economy based on them would therefore be essentially autarkic and permanent. Whether such an energy autarky is economically feasible depends on the technology both of breeder reactors and of the extraction of lowgrade uranium and thorium. On the basis of what is now known, it seems likely that both technologies are tenable, and that achievement of an energy autarky based on breeders should be possible within twenty to forty years.

SOLAR ENERGY RESEARCH AND THE NEW STATES

H. Tabor
National Physical Laboratory of Israel

While the widespread use of solar energy in the developed areas of the world appears doubtful, the situation for the underdeveloped areas looks more encouraging. Scientific research now being carried out all over the world - some of it quite basic and some directly applied to solar energy utilization - gives hope that devices will become available that will contribute to the development of these areas and the raising of the standard of living and comfort of their populations. Solar water heaters are already well established; solar cookers are practical devices for those communities willing to use them. Some form of air-conditioning as well as domestic refrigeration do not seem to be beyond the realms of possibility. Finally the prognosis for small power packages producing a few kilowatts of power at an equivalent cost of a few U.S. cents per KwHr is quite good. Such power units could greatly promote village economy.

The new nations need not rely entirely on scientists from without: their own scientists can play a valuable part in solar energy development especially as a result of their intimate knowledge of local conditions.

Solar devices are characterized by high first cost. The widespread use of such devices will depend, among other things, on adequate financing operations.

ECONOMIC PROSPECTS OF NUCLEAR POWER IN NEW STATES

J. A. Jukes
U.K. Atomic Energy Authority

The conditions under which nuclear power will be competitive with conventional power sources are discussed and an account is given of the changes that are likely to occur in the next few decades. The prospects are shown generally to be best in developed countries with poor fossil fuel resources and large electricity networks. The importance of high load factor and low rates of interest is emphasised.

As development proceeds, the cost of nuclear power should fall more quickly than the cost of other forms of energy, and nuclear power generation will tend to become competitive at lower load factors and in smaller units. An indication is given of the possible timing of these improvements.

Meanwhile, the total energy and electricity requirements of the New States will increase rapidly. This, with the rising energy requirements in the existing industrial countries, will lead to increasing pressure on world fossil fuel resources, and thus tend to increase costs. These factors will lead to a gradual extension of the field of application of nuclear power, which will itself help to reduce the costs of other fuels throughout the world.

The potential use of nuclear power will vary greatly between States according to the availability of fossil fuels and other forms of energy. In most cases the early economic growth of New States will be limited by the shortage of capital rather than shortage of energy. Capital intensive forms of energy, like nuclear power, will therefore be of limited application. At a later period, nuclear power should provide the energy requirements for continued economic growth, and should enable New States to be substantially free from limitations imposed by their access to fossil fuels.

In addition some special uses of nuclear power are likely to be advantageous in New States; for example, combined electricity production and water distillation may soon become economic in some situations.

SERVICE OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY TO AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION OF THE BASIC RESOURCES OF SOIL AND WATERS

W. C. Lowdermilk
Berkeley, California

Civilization is running a race with famine and the outcome is still in doubt. This doubt is due, not so much to limitations of natural resources, plundered as some are and untouched as are others, as to the lag in the takeup of modern agriculture among about two-thirds of mankind. These are, for the most part, subsistence or peasant farmers. At the same time, F.A.O. reports that two-thirds of the world population are now under-nourished, scantily clothed and poorly housed. Moreover demographers predict an oncoming population explosion, repercussions of which are already being felt especially among less developed peoples of the world. This is a tremendous challenge to statesmen, scientists and technologists of today, greater than that of war. This challenge confronts more particularly new nations rising out of less developed regions of the world.

How to respond to requests of new and old states of less developed peoples for technical assistance in down to earth undertakings calls for programming, integration and works in many fields. Such response confronts the more developed countries of the United Nations with a stupendous task. So far, Specialized Agencies of the U.N. have accomplished a small part of what is yet to be done. In no sector is the task so great as in the conversion of traditional agriculture into progressive scientific agricultural uses of land and waters for increasing production of adequate foods, fats and fibers. For there is before us a stupendous challenge to prepare lands and waters to grow enough foods and of the right kinds, as well as industrial crops for this oncoming burst of human population, predicted by the end of the century to be 5 to 6 billion souls.

Among the broad activities required are the following:

1. Personnel Training: Development of land and water resources will progress only as personnel are adquate in training and in numbers and sufficiently financed. It takes far more time to train a farmer than a soldier. Good training is called for in policy making, in administration, in scientific and technical fields, in surveys of several kinds, in agricultural and water engineering, in agronomy, in animal husbandry, in farming and in skilled labor. For no program will be effective until the farmer is effective. The farmer is central in this program.

2. Resource Surveys: Preparation of programs and plans of resource development calls for surveys and mapping of many features of a region under consideration. The most up-to-date and rapid aerial and photogrametric techniques are called for to compile necessary information. Such activities include surveys in topographic and geologic mapping, in soil and land classification, in past and present land-use and soil erosion and in delineation of problem areas in land-use and conservation in order of seriousness. Such surveys will also add to a body of Basic Data necessary to orderly planning and programming and implementation of measures and works.

3. Research: Much will be required of Research. Solutions to urgent problems will be needed immediately whereas scientific studies may require years for answers. Accordingly, Research will be called on (1) to evaluate going practices of the region for provisional answers, and (2) to test adaptations of results of research in countries of more advanced agriculture, (3) to set up programs of collection of essential data in land and water resources and uses, and (4) to undertake or to enlarge programs of both shortrange and long-range developments for solutions to local problems.

Research in water control use and conservation is becoming increasingly important in regions where water is a limiting factor. This is becoming so in much of the habitable part of the world and justifies a special field of inquiry that may be designated Agricultural Hydrology. This leads to integrated River Basin development and is especially important where two or more nations share the same river basin.

Competition for water for domestic, industrial and agricultural requirements calls for determinations as to how to realise the highest uses of each cubic meter of rain, surface and ground waters and in control and conservation of storm waters.

This competition and urge to develop arid regions justifies programs of research in desalinization of brackish and sea waters, as can be seen today in the United States and in Israel. Water control, development and conservation is becoming a key problem throughout the world. The requirements of civilized man for water are increasing in geometric ratio, even faster than that of population,

4. Application to the Land: Agro-industrial Pilot Projects. To apply appropriate branches of Science and Technology to actual conditions in less developed regions, the author suggests the use of pioneer pilot projects with three-fold objectives. These are (1) agricultural improvements in production per crop, per unit area and per man; (2) decentralized industries, as a part of general industrialization to give employment to man-power released by a more efficient agriculture, and (3) village improvement including good roads, transportation facilities, water supply, sanitation, public health, clinics, schools and community cooperation.

Such pioneer projects should not be too small or too large, say between 7,000 to 10,000 hectares or 15,000 to 25,000 acres. Preferably each confined in a drainage basin. For such a project would be within knowledge of its inhabitants, and should naturally create a community of interest and collaboration. It is suggested that schools of the project area make the natural resources of the project area and their development a subject of continuing study in all its aspects, and to create a special attachment to the land and its waters that support them. As their lives are sacred, so is the land that supports them.

Moreover, such projects would also serve as training centers for personnel to establish still other pioneer projects until the country would be covered.

Such would then be the setting for presenting a challenge to young and old alike in creating a productive basis for the growth and improved well-being of its inhabitants as an ever widening goal of the country.

COMPARATIVE STUDY OF CURRENT METHODS FOR DEMINERALIZING SEA-WATER

G. Dumesnil
Ex-Conseil Superieur de la Recherche Scientifique et du Progres Technique, France

The territories of young nations are often situated in arid zones. Since life is impossible without water, the development of their maritime regions is subordinated to the possibility of demineralizing sea water.

First, the conditions necessary for water for thermal power stations, the basis of all industrial development, are studied. Next the problem of drinking water, for which there are widely varying definitions, and finally the problem of irrigation water, for which the enormous requirements exclude all economic solution, are investigated.

The various procedures for demineralization are then discussed. Particular emphasis is given to distillation in all its forms, since this is the only method that has proved its effectiveness and been used economically in large capacity installations. Some of these have been in use for a long time, and have provided enough reliable information to permit reasonable extrapolation. The advantages and disadvantages of different methods (multiple distillation, instantaneous, by thermo-compression, without boiler, solar) are analyzed and compared. Next electrodialysis is studied; recent and extremely rapid progress in this direction has given rise to great hopes. Freezing is theoretically attractive, but runs into difficulties which must still be overcome. Other methods are discussed, some of them efficacious but costly, the most recent still under investigation.

Finally, a study is presented of the cost of demineralizing sea water, emphasizing the difficulty of giving precise conclusions. Every new installation is a special case for which one must weigh each of several determining factors, such as capacity of production, geographical and economic site, political constraints, etc. In any case, the reduction of the net price of local energy is a condition for obtaining sweet water from sea water and the hope is that nuclear energy will make this possible.

THE APPLICATION OF THE GEOSCIENCES IN DISCOVERY AND DEVELOPMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES

L. V. Berkner
President, Associated Universities Inc., New York

The geosciences are almost as old as man himself. Man's very evolution was controlled by the environment that the earth provided. Certainly, the earliest written tablets refer to his dependence on the earth, to his preliminary observations, and to his fears of the uncertainties inherent in nature. Much of mythology was surrounded by subjective description of the origin of destructive forces of man's surroundings.

In the absence of a logical and analytical science of the earth, a belief in the natural control of man's environment was beyond his understanding. This attitude has persisted to recent times and turned man from critical investigations of his surroundings. The new science of Newton and his successors has been applied to the earth with real vigor only in the last century. Temperature and pressure records of the atmosphere, the strength and orientation of the magnetic field, and the character of earthquakes, as examples, have been recorded only since the mid-nineteenth century. So man has today in any detail, only a fleeting record of geophysical history on which to base his estimates of the future. This record can, of course, be reinforced by a variety of indirect deductions from geological and geophysical methods.

The geosciences have developed with increasing tempo as more complete and ready access to the whole surface of the earth has come available. In the past ten years, symbolized by the International Geophysical Year, the growth of the earth sciences has become explosive. With that phenomenal growth are appearing a whole variety of applications from geosciences that are destined to have the most profound effect on the wealth of civilization, and the control of its environment.

The paper then reviews some of the implications, derived from geoscientific progress, that may affect man's future. Applied seismology, coupled with measurements of gravity, and geomagnetic anomoly provide structural analysis which with geochemical study are the key to petroleum and mineral exploration. For example, in the past year or two, using very advanced and complex electronic and computer methods in applied seismology, the estimate of the world's known oil reserves have been nearly doubled, from 312 billion barrels to about 600 billion barrels.

Likewise, some of the implications of progress in the sciences of meteorology, oceanography, hydrology, and geomagnetism are discussed. The character of development of the geosciences and the applications therefrom for man's welfare are estimated.

In conclusion, man cannot avoid the premise that in an era of exploding population, one great hope of improving man's welfare lies in most exact and advanced studies of every aspect of his environment, and the exploitation of those studies in applied geoscience.

THE ROLE OF HYDROLOGY AND OF RELATED DISCIPLINES IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES

D.B. Krimgold
FAO/UN. Special Fund - Joint Nahal Shikma Watershed Project

Rapidly increasing use of water, at rates exceeding natural replenishment, is posing grave problems in many parts of the world. The availability of water in quantities and quality required for domestic, industrial and agricultural purposes can no longer be taken for granted even in the so-called humid regions. In the wake of rapid industrialization and urbanization, industrial and domestic uses are claiming an ever increasing part of the limited water supply. Water has thus become the limiting factor not only in agriculture, but also in the establishment and expansion of industry and of centers of population. To alleviate the present and future shortage of water, various schemes - such as "rain-making," evaporation, suppression and desalinization of sea water - have been under active consideration in recent years. Of these schemes desalinization has received the greatest attention and appears to show the greatest promise. But the day when the production of irrigation water from the sea, and its delivery to points of use may become economically feasible is still remote. Therefore, effective means must be found now for maximum conservation and utilization of water that is now being wasted, and for eliminating wasteful uses of water.

Great strides have been made during the last 30 years in the fields of Hydrology, Hydrogeology, Hydropedology, Agricultural Meteorology and other related fields that call for a revised more up-to-date approach to the solution of water problems in arid as well as in humid regions of the world.

Concluding his statement at the opening meeting of the Governing Council of the United Nations Special Fund, Mr. Hoffman, the Managing Director of the Fund, said: "Finally, may I say that we must not be content with old concepts of how the interests of the people of the world can best be advanced or the rate at which they can be advanced. In this day of startling scientific achievements and rapidly advancing technology, old standards are not good enough. We dare not be pedestrians either in our thinking or in our actions. Practical, yes. But only bold and imaginative plans and actions are practical when measured against the pressing needs of the developing nations."

It is the purpose of this paper to discuss how the new knowledge in Hydrology and related fields can be utilized in solving some of the water problems facing the new states, and to briefly describe the United Nations Special Fund Pilot Project in Watershed Management on the Nahal Shikma Watershed in Israel.

On this project, the newly gained knowledge is being applied "boldly and imaginatively" in the spirit of Mr. Hoffman's statement quoted above.

WATER DEVELOPMENT OF ARID COUNTRIES

A. Wiener
Director General, Israel Water Planning (Tahal)

We wish here to outline a policy for the water development of arid countries, with particular application to Israel.

A precondition for the determination of a planning policy is the establishment of broad economic objectives, or at least priorities. In determining the ultimate objectives of water development as a means of production, the economic, social and political criteria must be kept clearly in mind. The cost to benefit ratio of each project must be carefully calculated, as well as the impact on the country's balance of payments and the time-relation between the flow of investments and the flow of benefits. Efficient use should be made of available manpower and training in planning and executing projects. Legal and administrative problems also require considerable effort. Finally, a great deal of research must of course be done into the technical aspects - engineering, geological, meteorological, etc.

In developing a water policy, a country should follow the initial trial and error practice by rapid engineering of high-priority projects. In the meanwhile, data can be collected for creating a Master Plan, which will of course require continuous revision.

In Israel, the primary planning criterion results from the fact that the available amount of water is itself the limiting factor. The Master Plan must be projected up to full use of available water. Special local conditions must be carefully studied - such as the availability of Lake Tiberias as a means of storage at source.

THE DESIGN OF CLOUD SEEDING EXPERIMENTS AND THEIR APPLICATION TO MARGINAL RAINFALL AREAS

E. G. Bowen
Chief, Division of Radiophysics,
Australian Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization

It is now well established that silver iodide acts as a highly effective freezing nucleus in supercooled clouds which have a temperature of -6°C or cooler. If other conditions are satisfied, for example if a cloud has adequate water content, is relatively long-lived and of sufficient depth, seeding with silver iodide may then induce useful rain to fall to the ground.

The extent to which silver iodide seeding may modify the rainfall over large areas depends almost entirely on the frequency with which the right type of clouds appear. In the completely arid regions of the world, the chances of inducing rain to fall by this method are small or non-existent, but in the semi-arid regions in which the right types of cloud are known to occur in certain seasons, the method has real application and could bring about important changes in the agricultural economy. There are extensive regions of the globe which fall into this category.

The actual increase in rainfall which might be obtained in any given region is impossible to predict and it must be determined experimentally. Such an experiment should be:

(1) Operationally suited to the geography and climatology of the region.

(2) Properly designed to give reasonable chances of arriving at a good quantitative answer.

(3) Continued for at least 3 to 5 years (or seasons) to obtain an adequate sample of the weather.

Many experiments of this nature which were undertaken in the past were sadly lacking in good design and led to much controversy about the results. A form of experiment has now been arrived at which is both operationally acceptable and statistically satisfying and, when properly applied, is capable of giving reliable quantitative answers.

In the earlier form of experiment, two areas A and B were selected. One was seeded and the other not, and a comparison of the rainfall A to B then made. Unfortunately during the course of such an experiment it was possible for a long-term climatic change to favour area A as compared with B, or vice versa, and thus vitiate the result. The solution to this difficulty is to seed either A or B on a completely random basis and then make the comparison:

$$\frac{(A:B)_A \text{ seeded}}{(A:B)_B \text{ seeded}}$$

Five experiments of this kind are now in progress in Australia. Of these, one in South Australia has completed three years of operation and shows no change in precipitation due to seeding. Flight reports show that this is due to a comparative absence of supercooled cloud and a preponderance of clouds which are inversion limited and rain by the coalescence process.

In the other four experiments, supercooled clouds appear frequently. Two show increases varying from 10% to 30% respectively, at significance levels better than 5%. The remaining two experiments are proceeding very satisfactorily but have not yet run long enough to give quantitative answers.

The lessons which may be learnt from Australian experience are :

(1) The importance of fundamental studies of the physics of cloud and precipitation processes being carried out in the general region where it is proposed to undertake rainmaking.

(2) The need for careful design and meticulous performance of the seeding experiments to determine the increase in rainfall which is possible from a given seeding procedure.

PRECIPITATION MODIFICATION IN ARID REGIONS

Louis J. Battan
Institute of Atmospheric Physics
The University of Arizona
Tucson, Arizona

The climatological characteristics of an arid region are small annual rainfall amounts with high variabilities from year to year. High temperature and low humidities lead to rapid loss of surface water by evaporation. In some arid regions, irrigated agriculture has been making exhorbitant demands on ground water supplies and excessive pumping has led to serious drops in the water table. The value of additional water and of more efficient storage and utilization of that precipitation which does fall, are obvious.

This paper deals with an extended series of experiments, performed in Arizona, in which clouds have been seeded in efforts to ascertain if rainfall increases can be produced. The basic experimental design involves seeding half the suitable days during the summer rainy season. This is accomplished by seeding one of adjacent pairs of cloudy days according to a suitable randomization scheme. The seeding is done with a silver-iodide generator mounted on a small airplane capable of flying for four to five hours at levels where the temperature is about -6°C (18,000 to 20,000 ft). The effects of the seeding are sought through the study of rain gage data, as well as through the use of radar observations of precipitation, cloud photographs and visual observations.

The investigation has been concerned with convective clouds over a mountain range about 15 miles northeast of Tucson.

Three years of experimentation have been completed, and at least another two years are planned. The observations collected to date have yielded the following results:

(1) The mean rainfall was about 7% higher on the seeded days but the differences between the mean rainfall amounts taken by pairs of days has no statistical significance;

(2) There were more large thunderstorms on the seeded days. From the statistical view point the results are suggestive but not significant.

(3) A higher fraction of the subcooled clouds contained precipitation echoes on the seeded days.

All these results are in the direction one would expected if the silver-iodide nuclei were augmenting an inadequate supply of natural ice-crystal nuclei.

It is well known that meteorological phenomena are highly variable and one must admit the possibility that observed differences were a result of chance. In order to establish significant effects when a small change is espected, large samples are needed. Although the results obtained so far cannot be regarded as being statistically significant, they certainly strongly suggest that the AgI seeding produced some important changes in the precipitation characteristics. If the observed differences were caused by seeding, two more seasons of experimentation should reveal this to be the case.

THE ROLE OF CHEMICAL FERTILIZERS IN INCREASING AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION IN UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

Frank W. Parker
Assistant Director-General, Technical Department,
Food and Agriculture Organization

Although agriculture is the major occupation of man, production is inadequate in most of the world. Only the more developed and industrialized countries have attained specialized levels of agricultural production adequate for their needs.

Plant food and water are two major factors limiting crop yields. Plant food is almost universally a limiting factor. Water may be considered the first limiting factor when rainfall is less than 20-40 inches, depending on its distribution and other climatic factors.

Most soils of the world will produce yields of 800-1,400 kgs. of grain per hectare without the use of fertilizers. Crop yields in Europe and Japan were of that order of magnitude one hundred years ago. Most underdeveloped countries have average crop yields in the same range.

Chemical fertilizers which provide plant food in accordance with soil and plant requirements, along with other improved practices, have doubled or trebled crop yields in many countries. Their use on a very extensive scale is essential for adequate agricultural production in Asia, the Near East, Africa and Latin America. The plant food requirements of the underdeveloped countries exceed those of Western Europe and North America. A substantial proportion of their requirements should be provided within the next 10-20 years.

The Food and Agriculture Organization and member countries, with the assistance of the fertilizer industry throughout the world, is initiating a Fertilizer Program as a part of the Freedom from Hunger Campaign. Its objective is to accelerate the use and production of fertilizers in the underdeveloped countries at a rate which will help assure agricultural production, and make its appropriate contribution to improved living standards and general economic development.

GROUNDWATER EXPLORATION IN ISRAEL

L. Picard
Hebrew University, Jerusalem

The groundwater research and technology from ancient times to the second world war are described in a historical review. This is followed by a more detailed chapter on Israel's outstanding groundwater discoveries during the last decades. In this latter period we note a close inter-relationship between the growing agricultural development and the constant progress in groundwater exploration. It led to the recognition of a major aquifer in the Upper Cretaceous limestone formations of which our mountains and foothille are built. Most water wells of this karstic aquifer were drilled either in the foothills or in the border-region of the mountains. Recently, however, exploration has also gone into the higher regions and opened up wells, with good results, in the surroundings of Jerusalem.

Intensive cultivation and increasing population, combined with overpumping and seawater encroachment in the coastal plain, demanded a thorough study of Israel's second important aquifer attached to the sandy formations of the coastal plain.

Before the establishment of the State, research was carried out by individuals of various institutions, including the University, the Jewish Agency and the Mandatory Government. Drilling was carried out mostly by private companies and "Mekoroth". With the foundation of the Water Planning Agency of Israel, "TAHAL", exploration was greatly extended, and the programme from initial planning to the final stage of production is now dealt with by a team of engineers, geologists, geophysicists, hydrologists, chemists, economists etc., with an operational set-up analogous to that of an oil company.

Many drillings now disclose water from depths of 2,000 to 3,000 feet and have tested different geological structures and various formations, including the Lower Cretaceous and alluvial fans of the Negeb. Well discharge is on the average 200 to 300 cubic meter per hour, but in several individual cases the yield is 1,000 cb.m./h.

Cyclic droughts and salinity are still our major problems. These we hope, at least in part, to overcome by artificial replenishments of our aquifers. Studies in this direction are in progress. In this and many other investigations, grants and advice of foreign institutions (USOM, F.A.O. etc.) were of important help.

FIBRE SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF NEW COUNTRIES

Menachem Lewin
Institute for Fibres and Forest Products Research
Ministry of Commerce and Industry, Jerusalem

Fibre industries constitute a major part of the economy of any country and are second in importance only to food producing industries. They cover a variety of products in the field of textiles, communications, housing and packaging. Recent developments in fibre science and technology enable a large variety of materials of specifically designed properties to be producted from fibrous plants.

The raw materials for the fibre industries consist of cultivated plants, forest stands, wild growing desert plants and agricultural residues. Each of these groups presents different problems and potentials for development. The shift in the raw materials for pulp and paper from coniferous woods to hardwoods and agricultural residues is caused by the shortage in conifers in most new countries and by rapidly increasing consumption of pulp products in the world. Another important development is tree farming.

Prior to the establishment of a fibre development project, several steps have to be undertaken. A survey of plants available and potentially available in the country has to be carried out and its results correlated with economic considerations of the feasibility of the given project, as well as with a projection of the future consumption of the products according to the aims the country sets out to achieve.

Cultivation of fibre plants has to be preceded by agricultural, agrotechnical, chemical and technological research. Cultivation has to be continuously watched as to the properties of the fibres obtained, in view of changes occuring in plants on transfer from country to country.

Fibre extraction methods consist essentially in the decomposition of the middle lamella, holding the fibres together by mechanical, chemical, biological, physico-chemical and mechano chemical methods. The properties of the products obtained vary according to the extraction methods as well as according to the raw material. The extraction method suitable for a given fibre plant should be chosen after proper experimentation. The production variables of the chosen method have to be closely studies so as to provide a full basis for planning and economic evaluation.

The utilisation of waste products is an important part of any fibre development project, ensuring better utilisation of the plant and increasing the economic feasibility.

Examples of several research and development projects carried out in the last 12 years in Israel substantiate the major points discussed in this paper.

The importance of personnel previously trained for the development project is stressed.

The need for specific products meeting the climatic and social conditions of new countries should be considered and investigated.

SEA WATER DISTILLATION AS A MAJOR ADDITION TO THE NATURAL WATER RESOURCES

I. Vilentchuk
Israel Mining Industries

As local water resources gradually become exhausted, more water has to be transported from greater distances. The investment, as well as the operating costs, for the supply of a unit of water are on the increase. Cheap water from, as yet undeveloped, natural resources is very scarce.

Of several methods of sea-water conversion, distillation is the only one which has reached the stage of industrial production.

The coupling of steam turbine power plants with land based distillation plants by making use of their exhaust steam, considerably reduces the fuel element cost of the conversion process. It is estimated that within the next 3 to 5 years the cost of converted sea water by large conversion plants coupled with large modern steam power plants will be about 8.25 ¢ per m3 or 31 ¢ per 1000 U.S. Gal. on present-day fuel costs. Further technological development is visualized, which may further reduce the cost of converted sea water.

A Power Plant of, say, 100,000 kw. capacity, taking the base load will be in a position to convert 50 to 60 million m^3 of sea water per annum.

When planning power development schemes in a country where water shortage may become acute in the near future, due consideration should be given to the question of coupled power-sea water conversion development schemes. Under certain conditions, converted sea water, even at a cost as high as 8.25 ¢ per m^3, may constitute a very important addition to the natural water resources. Israel may serve as an example in this respect. By the end of the current decade her natural water resources will be fully exploited. Through coupling of sea water conversion plants with some of the new steam turbine power plants to be constructed in Israel during that period, up to 200 million m3 of potable water per year may be added to the available natural water resources of the country - an increase of 12 %.

FOOD PRODUCTION IN ITS RELATION WITH PRESENT AND FUTURE POPULATION FIGURES

Michael W. Perrin
Chairman, The Wellecome Foundation,
London, U.K.

An effective balance between human population and food supply must, eventually, depend on the application of birth control to compensate for the achievements of medical knowledge in the prevention and cure of disease and on the same world-wide scale. The scientific and economic problems which remain to be solved before such a programme could be implemented are great. Social attitudes and religious beliefs will further delay the time when any technically practical method could be generally accepted.

Over a period of time, therefore, that may be much longer than is suggested by the enthusiastic advocates of the chemotherapeutic possibilities of birth control, the increase in human population must be matched by increasing food supply.

The scientific and technological problems which have to be solved to meet this requirement are relatively less difficult and the following examples are chosen to illustrate their different types.

In the present state of knowledge it would be possible to meet more adequately the food requirements of the present human population of the world if some changes were made in many existing diets. The growth of crops, for example, which would provide a better balance between protein and carbohydrate could, relatively quickly and easily, be of benefit. But any such changes in diet involve a change in social habits which may need more effort to bring about, by education and example, than to overcome the related economic and technical difficulties.

A second, and different, example is that of greater utilisation of the oceans as a source of human food supply. This possibility has long been recognised but its full development depends on the solution of very large scale technological difficulties which will only be possible by the application of the methods of physical and chemical engineering; it being recognised that the fundamental difference between a surface area of land and of water is in the different order of magnitude of the effective depth below the latter.

The last example to be mentioned is that of the development of greater efficiency in the utilisation of animals as a supply of human food. Veterinary science already provides many solutions to the problems of increasing the productivity of the animal population and the prevention of disease can undoubtedly be carried much further still.

These examples will be supported with figures which suggest that food supply could better match the needs of the existing human population and increase with it for a much longer time than is often assumed.

BIOLOGICAL APPROACHES TO THE PROBLEM OF POPULATION

M.C. Shelesnyak
Weizmann Institute of Science, Israel

The problem of population is, in the broad sense, one of the number of units of the species under consideration and the change and rate of change of this number. But number alone is part of the problem; quality must also enter. The population problem is not limited to the population of man, but includes that of animal life ranging from domesticated livestock to insect pests and to microorganisms useful to man as well as to pathogens. From this viewpoint, population changes - increase or decrease - have positive or negative anthropocentric values.

The term control, in population control or fertility control, has a connotation suggesting "restraint". It would be more consistent with the full appreciation of the general problem to use the word regulation. This allows for the concept of increasing where desired, as in the case of livestock (food source); decreasing, as in case of pest animals; or maintaining a specific level.

The biological approach needs a sweeping ecological understanding of the elements involved. Here we must consider social-anthropological, physical environmental, and specific biotopic factors as well as physiological ones. The comprehension of the basic physiology of reproduction is of fundamental importance for without it we cannot exercise intelligent planned regulation. Unfortunately, we are still lacking much of the basic information concerning physiological mechanisms of conception.

The picture is not entirely pessimistic for we do know which areas need attention. However, we are aware of the need for greater research efforts. These research efforts will require more trained personnel. Since the biological approach is broad, the new trainees should be capable of understanding more than the physiological aspects; they should be knowledgeable in the ecological aspects, the social-cultural, the environmental, and so on. Therefore, we conclude that Newer States should encourage and stimulate the training of their young people for research in these problems. Established scientists and scientific institutions must assume a more active role in proper training of such talent.

UTILIZATION OF ALGAE AS FOODSTUFF AND THEIR POTENTIAL USE AS GREEN MANURE IN JAPAN

Atsushi Watanabe
Institute of Applied Microbiology,
University of Tokyo, Tokyo

Many kinds of marine algae have long been used as food, feed or the raw material of industry in various areas of the Orient, especially in Japan. Commercial articles made of more than 20 species of these algae, which belong to Chlorophyceae, Phaeophyceae and Rhodophyceae, are easily available in the market and contribute significantly to the daily life of the people in Japan. The present lecture is concerned mainly with how to use these algal materials as foodstuff; the discussion will be concentrated on five typical representatives of edible algae: Enteromorpha, Laminaria, Hijikia, Porphyra and Gelidium.

The possibility of utilizing microalgae for a quite different purpose has been indicated recently by ecological as well as agricultural studies. In particular, the investigation by the lecturer on the utility of nitrogen-fixing blue-green algae as green manure to improve the fertility of paddy fields in Japan will be discussed briefly.

MENTAL HEALTH AND ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES

Brock Chisholm, M.D., C.B.E., M.C.
Canada
(Sometime Director-General, World Health Organization)

The advancement of new states implies rapid and extensive changes, not only in social and economic organization, technical and industrial development and in education, but also in the ways of feeling and thinking of very large numbers of people. Every person involved in cultural change is subjected to new types and degrees of pressure to himself appropriately to changing circumstances. The ability to change without damage to the personality and disruption of its functions depends on the state of mental health of each person. Rapid social change is a severe test of the mental health of the people concerned. If mental health is good the necessity to change will be experienced as a challenge, an adventure, and an opportunity for joyous accomplishment. If mental health is poor, any pressure toward change may be felt as a threat to the precarious stability and security of the personality, and even violent or destructive attempts to avoid the necessity to change may be made.

While much is now known, more understanding is needed of the process of development of the capacity for constructive change. In a world where, in only a few years, the conditions of human survival have changed so greatly, the ability of individuals in all cultures to change their own attitudes has become immeasurably more important. Such changes need to be accomplished without feelings of disloyalty or guilt, because if those feelings are heavily involved the changes, if they can be made at all, are likely to be highly emotional, defiant and violent, and consequently destructive, rather than reasoned, controlled and constructive.

There is much evidence to suggest that in many cultures a major pressure on children is to accept without question and to conform absolutely to the parental attitudes and customs, whatever those may happen to be and whether they are really appropriate to new and future situations or not. Loyalty and duty to the parents, and early ingrained fear of their displeasure and rejection, may prevent or make very difficult any later attempt to abandon or revise such attitudes or customs, even if they may no longer be socially valuable or appropriate to new circumstances. For children so overcontrolled by parental or ancestral patterns there is also the danger that, with growth and only a degree of revolt normal to attainment of independence, rejection of all parental attitudes may occur, whether or not they, or some of them, are still valid and useful. Total rejection of parental attitudes can be as destructive as total acceptance; both extremes produce inadequate adjustment to change and act as barriers to effective, cooperative and satisfying living.

Education and development of children everywhere need reconsideration in the light of the present need for change of many traditional human behaviour patterns. In newly independent and in new states such needs are particularly pressing.

RADIOISOTOPES IN MEDICINE - 1960

Marshall Brucer, M.D.
Chairman, The Medical Division
Oak Ridge Institute of Nuclear Studies
Oak Ridge, Tennessee

Artificially produced radioisotopes are now a quarter of a century old. As expected with any new form of diagnosis and therapy, many false leads were followed, many mistakes were made. Many bandwagon enthusiasms have now died out, and some things that seemed impossible have been achieved.

All radioisotope work must be done with instruments. But the instruments are worthless unless they are used to make measurements; and the measurements are worthless unless they are assessed in the light of other measurements on other instruments. None of this is of any value by itself. The assessment of measurements made on instruments must be communicated: to colleagues, to patients, and to students. These four together - instrumentation, measurement, assessment, and communication - although each is a science in itself, make up the organization of medical science.

Although the atomic age started with Plank and Roentgen and Rutherford and Einstein at the turn of the century, the public awareness of radiation started with an atomic bomb during a war. This was followed by a period of public radiation hysteria which, though not new, emphasized the destructive effects of radiation. Radiation safety has become during recent years a No.1 public relations problem. But it is not really a scientific problem, for the methods of handling even large amounts of radiation are well understood. The real medical problem is not in the awareness of the necessity for radiation safety; it is in the treatment of accidents.

How should we look at the small but specific field of nuclear medicine? If one is a dean of a medical school, he must visualize these problems as very general. A practitioner of medicine has different names for the same problems. If one is setting up a radiation facility, one is interested primarily in instruments that fit both the clinic and the curriculum.

In the clinical use of radioisotopes a specific problem in the greater problem of treatment is of intense interest but is often forgotten: "calibration of equipment." For example, two specific instruments seem to be increasing in importance; one is the Total-Body Irradiator and the other is the Whole-Body Counter. After a quarter century of experiment, it appears that these are really the instruments from which all the others receive their ultimate calibration.

As in any medical field, nuclear medicine is concerned with diagnosis, therapy, and research. In diagnosis the trends are toward nondestructive testing. In therapy, as in any therapeutic procedure, a main problem is overexposure to radiation. In research there can be no prediction because, if a thing can be predicted, then it is no longer a research problem.

Ultimately science must be taught: to colleagues, to younger scientists, and to the public. Education is the continuing problem. "What" to teach and "how" to teach is the most serious problem that faces nuclear medicine.

MEDICAL RESEARCH AND NEW COUNTRIES

S. Adler
Hebrew University, Jerusalem

The medical situation of any area is obviously the resultant of prevailing biological forces. This applies particularly to endemic diseases typical for a given area quite apart from cosmopolitan diseases which like the great plague epidemics of the past have broken out with explosive violence and temporarily diverted the course of history.

Endemic diseases associated with unique local biological factors have determined the social structure and economic standards of large areas of Africa.

Before the age of modern medicine and microbiology they constituted an effective though unappreciated barrier to progress. African trypanosomiasis of man and domestic animals is a typical example. By limiting or even completely preventing the use of domestic animals in large areas of Africa man was compelled to rely entirely on the use of his own muscles, a relatively poor source of energy. It is impossible to imagine the great historic civilisations of the Near and Middle East without the donkey, horse, camel and ox which filled the role played by the steam engine in the nineteenth century. African trypanosomiasis which deprived man of an important source of energy is directly and indirectly responsible for a backward agriculture and malnutrition and occasional depopulation. Half a century and more of research in tropical medicine has shown that this barrier to progress created by local biological conditions is indeed formidable but not unsurpassable. It will eventually be overcome or rendered negligible by advances in applied biology and chemotherapy though the end is not yet in sight.

Trypanosomiasis is only one of a number of important examples which may be given. Malaria in the past has determined the fate of whole populations and still presents a formidable problem in the tropica though it is on the way out in many countries where it was recently prevalent.

Schistosomiasis in some respects presents a more difficult and more complex problem than malaria or trypanosomiasis because of the bionomics of the various vectors and the enormous and variegated areas of its distribution in Africa,

South America and the Far East. A break through in molluscicides comparable to that in modern insecticides has not been achieved. Schistosomiasis today requires at least the attention given to malaria during the last two generations. The above diseases, and also major helminthic diseases such as filariasis and the insect born viruses of which new species are being discovered annually constitute a challenge to man's capacity to control his environment which is the very essence of progress.

The ideal cannot be achieved without more intensive work in tropical medicine including the chemotherapy of parasitic disease of man and domestic animals. Successful chemotherapy of Theilereiosis in cattle (which has not yet been achieved) and further advances in the chemotherapy of trypanosomiasis might well achieve a revolution in cattle breeding, dairy farming and human nutrition in large areas of Africa.

Control and eradication of diseases of man and diseases of man and domestic animals are obvious necessities but may contribute little or nothing to the mitigation of poverty and malnutrition unless they are simultaneously associated with a revolution in agriculture which is imperative in view of the increase in population which has always followed in the wake of medical progress.

DANGERS OF IONIZING RADIATION

H. Jammet
French Atomic Energy Commission

Ionizing radiation has been considered dangerous since its discovery, and many pioneers in this field have paid for their discoveries with their lives. The development, not only of atomic energy, but also of many industrial, agricultural, medical and scientific applications using ionizing radiation increases the dangers as the extent and importance of the applications increases.

Exposure to radiation can occur in two manners: from a source outside the body at a distance from it and from radioactive contaminants either on the surface or within the organism. Both can arise from applications of atomic energy as well as medical uses of radiation. Workers exposed to radiation and the general population may be affected. For the first group, either irradiation at a distance or by direct radioactive contamination, particularly through the respiratory tract, can occur. For the latter group, radioactive contamination, by indirect paths such as ingestion of contaminated food, is the main danger.

The injuries that can result from exposure to radiation or radioactive substances are extremely varied. Generally they are divided into two categories: somatic effects in the exposed individual himself and genetic effects influencing his descendants. In order adequately to treat for radiation exposure, one must know the conditions of exposure, amount of radiation received, volume of the body irradiated, duration of exposure, type and energy of the radiation, types of tissues or organs affected. Radiation induced injuries have some characteristics in common: non-specificity, a latent period before the injury is evident, more or less complete destruction, damage genetically transmitted, and above all a dose-effect relation that is independent of the subsequent treatment. The injuries may also be classified into the two groups: benign on the one hand and radio-activity induced cancers and genetic mutations on the other.

To cope with these dangers, answers have had to be obtained to questions such as the existence or not of radiation not dangerous to man, and the levels of radiation that one can consider safe for these who work with radiation and for the general population. Various national and international organizations have provided satisfactory answers taking into account our present information, and a solid body of knowledge exists in regard to radiation protection.

The application of this information should, in the future, allow increased use of ionizing radiation and of atomic energy while still satisfying strict safety regulations. One may even predict that protection against radiation may serve as an example as much in the domain of technological safety as in the domain of public health.

MODERN EPIDEMIOLOGY IN THE SERVICE OF COMMUNITY HEALTH

M. J. Karvonen
Department of Physiology, Workers' Health Institution, Helsinki, Finland

The greatest potential source of wealth of a state is its citizens. It is in the interests of any state to take care of their health in the best possible way. Illness and injuries limit the chances of an individual to develop his personality and to display his capacities. Among the benefits that a state may procure for its citizens, a good health service is one of the corner-stones.

The medical services can be divided into preventive health work and curative medicine. Traditionally, building of hospitals, treatment of the sick, establishment of diagnostic facilities are the highlights of medical news. The finest biochemical, biophysical, and engineering tools are provided for the examination of a patient, before therapy is instituted.

In a contrast to this, preventive medicine has often used rather crude indices for mapping out the needs for active interference. Alarming epidemics, mortality statistics based on varying diagnostic practices, sometimes the dramatic nature of the illness - as with polio - have been directives of preventive health work.

The introduction of standardised laboratory methods has greatly added to the accuracy of diagnosis in the hospitals. The application of similar methods to the - much larger - population outside hospitals may be expected to bring out a better picture of the frequency of disease than mortality or hospital statistics can do. Such methods may also reveal the disease at a stage when a cure may be more easily achieved.

In the control of tuberculosis, a method for epidemiological study, the miniature x-ray of total populations, has become one of the main steps in the control of disease. In cancer, special cell staining methods are being developed both for epidemiology and for routine mass detection.

With progressing control of infectious disease, heart disease becomes the leading cause of death. According to statistics, mortality from cardiovascular disease is higher in Finland than in any other country. Men in the risk age have been examined in various parts of the country, using methods strictly identical to those used in studies in countries with lesser cardio-vascular mortality. Several differences have been observed between populations with different risks. A finding such as high serum cholesterol, electro-cardiographic anomaly etc. may not label an individual as a potential cardiac, but their frequent occurrence characterizes a population as having a high risk. The discovery of some differences points out possibilities for the prevention, but these must still be tested in sufficiently large-scale experiments.

There are diseases which may be common without, however, being seen often in mortality statistics. Iron deficiency anemia is such an example. Anemia restricts the working capacity and may reduce the resistance against other diseases. Again, without a systematic study of the serum iron and hemoglobin content of the blood of large samples of the population the occurrence and extent of this deficiency disease can not be gauged. The frequency of parasite infestation is another similar example.

In the medical services of a country, preventive health work can be efficiently directed only with the aid of continuous study of the population, not only of those in hospitals. Such research must have at its disposal adequate modern laboratory facilities and a staff who need not devote their energy to routine preventive measures or to curative medicine.

LESSONS FROM AN EXTENSIVE LEARNING PROJECT IN PHYSICS

Jerrold R. Zacharias
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

(The author is a member of the Executive Committee of Educational Services Inc., from whose Progress Report for 1959 this summary is taken)

Educational Services Incorporated, a nonprofit organization, was founded under the auspices of the National Academy of Sciences and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The organization was created to administer the Secondary School Physics Program of the Physical Science Study Committee. This Committee was organized at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to create a modern course in physics for secondary schools and to prepare materials for such a course. Committee membership included university professors, high school teachers, industrial scientists and technical specialists drawn from many parts of the country.

The first phase of the project, completed early in 1957, was the design of a physics syllabus which emphasized the logical interconnections of the subject and presented its modern aspects on a level suitable for high school students. Physics was treated as the product of experiment and theory constructed by real people with ingenuity, intuition, care and courage. It was shown to be a cultural force of importance to students with diverse interests and intentions.

In the second phase of the project a set of learning aids was developed, including a textbook, laboratory apparatus, laboratory guides, films, examinations and teachers' guides. The first versions were prepared in the summer of 1957 at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology by a group of 20 high school teachers and 25 university professors. Fifty colleges and universities have contributed professional staff, development work, and teacher training facilities. The Educational Testing Service of Princeton, New Jersey worked with the Committee to develop achievement tests and a testing program. Special mention should be made of the work performed on the teachers' guide at the University of Illinois. To provide supplementary reading for students, and for the general public, the Committee also initiated the Science Study Series of 100 paperback books.

More than 30,000 students in 650 secondary schools have studied preliminary versions of the PSSC course over the past three years (including the academic year 1959-60). Over 1,000 high school teachers have attended institutes concerned with the PSSC program. With the support of the National Science Foundation, 50 summer and in-service institutes convened for teachers interested in the PSSC course in 1958 and 1959. Most PSSC teachers have attended these institutes before introducing the course.

The experiences of teachers using preliminary materials in the classroom over the past three years have been studied through direct observation, analysis of achievement tests, discussion with the teachers and examination of their written reports. The "feedback" has led to a critical review of the program and revision of the course materials. Almost all reports indicate that students handle the new course well. This is also borne out by examination results and students' comments.

The 270 schools in which PSSC materials were tested during the academic year 1958-59 received materials free of charge. Commercial suppliers working with the Committee handled most of the printing, manufacturing and distributing operations. In the academic year 1959-60, most PSSC materials are supplied at cost to the 600 schools using the course. A small number of test schools are receiving films and recent text revisions free of charge.

THE TRAINING OF SCIENTIFIC PERSONNEL FOR NEWLY DEVELOPING AREAS

Mogens Pihl
Department of Physics, University of Copenhagen

This lecture deals particularly with the following topics:

1. The teaching of sciences in Secondary Schools in newly developing areas, and its influence on the establishment of a tradition of higher education within these disciplines.

2. The establishment of this tradition at universities and technical institutes of advanced studies.

3. The education of qualified students from newly developing areas at universities and technical institutes of advanced studies in other countries.

4. The employment of foreign experts to further the development of the teaching of sciences in these areas.

5. Selection and preparation of such experts for tasks in newly developing areas.

6. The possibility of assistance on bilateral and multilateral basis.

7. Advanced education within the country and abroad of experts in sciences already established within the country.

8. The development of cooperation among the newly developing areas as to these problems as a whole.

POLITICS AND ECONOMICS IN NEW STATES

David Horowitz
Governor, Bank of Israel

The gap between industrialized and less developed countries in their standards of life and economic conditions is the crucial problem of our time. Despite all the technological progress of modern times, there may be more poverty-stricken people in the world today than there were 50 or 100 years ago. The demographic pressures in the world at large are increasing, the main factor in the less developed countries being a decline in the mortality rate. This has been aggravated by a marked decline in the prices of primary products and the worsening of terms of trade for countries engaged in primary production. The tendency of the industrialized countries to consume conspicuously is conveyed to the less developed countries through modern media of mass communication and exerts a far-reaching influence on their economic policy and planning.

The capacity of a country to support its population and to raise its standards of life is to some extent a function of three factors: natural resources, skill, and capital. These three factors are to a very great extent interchangeable. The flow of capital for economic growth can be derived only from two resources: (a) capital formation through saving and accumulation, and (b) capital import. The process of primary accumulation of capital in the less developed countries is extremely slow. This does not mean that savings are precluded from playing any role in the economic growth of these countries. Nevertheless, the "great leap" would be effected only by supplementing the modest capital formation by outside assistance. The economic breakthrough effected through import of capital and know-how is under the circumstances the only alternative to a breakdown of democracy.

The problem of capital transfer must be viewed from the angle of the capital market. The demand for capital in highly-developed industrial countries is assuming unprecedented dimensions due to the new industrial revolution, rearmament, and the new needs of growing populations as well as to inflation - which reduces the incentives to saving and contributes to the expansion of domestic markets. Moreover, the difference in returns per unit of capital invested on the whole tends to favour mature economies. In fact, little capital flows to the less-developed countries via the natural processes of economic gravitation (a major exception - oil exploitation).

The way out of this vicious circle lies in a breakthrough effected by a tremendous initial capital outlay. This could put into motion selfperpetuating forces of economic expansion. The growth of the gross product of the world is so rapid, and its size so huge, that an allocation of a relatively small part of it for the development of the less-developed countries could launch them on the road of self-sustained growth.

PROBLEMS OF INFLATION IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Carl Iverson
Rector, University of Copenhagen, Denmark

It is intended to present a critical review of the common contention that inflation is a suitable or even necessary - or perhaps, in fact, the only possible - instrument for generating or enhancing economic development by stimulating domestic capital investment.

It should be recognized that not every credit expansion is inflationary, and that an expansionary economic policy may serve, under favourable circumstances, to speed up investment activity. But it is equally important to be aware of the obstacles with which such a policy will often meet.

When more developed countries suffer from widespread unemployment there are usually not only idle men, but also idle machinery. But even if a less developed country has unemployed or 'underemployed' man power, it normally lacks material means of production. This makes it much more difficult to get a development process started without running into balance-of-payment difficulties. Lack of internal mobility of both persons and commodities further enhance the difficulties, and sooner or later 'bottlenecks' are bound to be encountered. Thus both external and internal factors may contribute to start the well-known upward spiral movement of prices and wages.

The main problem discussed in the lecture is whether even in this case, in the face of threatening inflation, the expansionary policy should be continued in the interest of promoting economic development still further by means of "forced saving."

The "social costs" of inflation are reviewed, and it is argued that they represent not only an unjust but also an unnecessarily high "tax" on the masses. In view of the adverse effects of inflation on voluntary saving, it is questioned to what extent inflation results in a real net increase in the total volume of investment over and above what could have been obtained without it. Furthermore, a number of factors are mentioned which tend to distort the structure of investment.

In conclusion it is demonstrated that there are other and better means for promoting economic development.

THE ECONOMICS OF SCIENTIFIC DEVELOPMENT

J. H. de Boer
Central Laboratorium, Staatsmijnen in Limburg, Geleen, The Netherlands, and Technological University, Delft, The Netherlands

A country, which has experienced little or no research, and which wishes to develop itself from, let us say, a mostly agricultural economy into a more technical or industrial economy, is well advised to procure for itself a sufficient number of high standing scientists and engineers to advise its government with respect to the most efficient ways and methods of organizing an economical set-up of its research.

It is very easy to spend a lot of time and money, and to employ numerous research workers, without obtaining adequate results. The aims must be clear, the execution must be directed by scientists having broad views and experience in wide fields, but who need not be specialists. No expensive equipment should be bought if it is not absolutely necessary. A well-balanced plan should be drawn up and adhered to for the training of research scientists in various fields. A warning may be given not to be fascinated by spectacular branches of modern research which are in fashion nowadays, but which may not be needed by such a country for many years to come.

From a certain state of wealth onwards, research is a necessary condition in order to be able to proceed with improvements. This is an expensive business, but, if well conceived and well conducted, gives rich profits. These profits may embrace a better nourishment of the population, an improvement of the health and of the hygienic conditions, a greater security against disasters from natural causes, an increase in the export of goods of the country and, consequently, of the import of other desirable goods etc.

THE INTERNATIONAL GEOPHYSICAL YEAR

J. Kaplan
Physics Department, University of California

The great enterprise of the International Geophysical Year (IGY) was initiated and sponsored by the International Council of Scientific Unions (ICSU), which appointed a special committee to organize and to supervise the program. For this reason, and particularly because the ICSU will play an increasingly significant role in future world wide cooperative scientific enterprises for the welfare of mankind, the first part of the paper will be devoted to a description of scientific cooperation at the non-governmental level, which provided the basis for the IGY and which must provide the pattern for future successful programs involving international cooperation in science.

The second part of the paper will describe the IGY, the International Geophysical Cooperation 1959, and the various special committees of the ICSU that have grown out of the IGY. Because of the special role of space research in the recent history of science, and because of its great promise for future cooperation in science and its broad impacts on the affairs of our planet, the paper will give particular emphasis to this phase of the IGY program.

THE PLANNING OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN NEW COUNTRIES

Ernst D. Bergmann
Chairman, Israel Atomic Energy Commission

1. The notion "underdeveloped country" implies today a value judgment, viz. a comparison with the highly industrialised economies of Europe and the United States of America. Even if the new countries aspire to this standard, one must realise that there is no direct road to it, and that a number of conditions must be fulfilled before new countries can embark on this road.

2. Israel is not a typical new country; the drawing of analogies between Israel and other new nations is apt to lead to erroneous conclusions. There existed two anomalies in the situation of the emerging State of Israel: the establishment of the State was accompanied by mass immigration, the burden of which was compensated by influx of capital from abroad, - and a considerable part of the population had a long scientific and technological, or at least intellectual, tradition and could thus occupy positions of leadership from the very beginning. However, it is submitted that Israel's specific experience - perhaps because of these two distinguishing factors - may be of some value in considering the general problem of the trend of development in newly created countries.

3. The thesis, often propounded by economists, that poverty is necessarily an obstacle to its own conquest, is patently incorrect. This thesis says: it is impossible for a new country, lacking natural resources or lacking knowledge of its natural resources, to arrive at a growth of its per capita income, because the growth of income is a function of investment, investment a function of saving, and saving a function of income. It appears that the economists have equated low income with low rate of economic development; not only Israel, but many other countries in South-East Asia, in Africa, in South America provide arguments against this thesis.

4. The political awakening of the new countries and their rise to independence are powerful forces, at least equal in importance to the laws of economics. Secondly, the development of the means of transportation and communication creates new wants and automatically leads to the need for a rise in living standards. The new countries must ensure that these new wants are met by a parallel increase in productivity and production.

5. The new nations do not need science in the form in which it has developed in the highly industrialised countries. To imitate these countries, would mean creation of a layer of the population which is completely detached from the life of the country and its vital necessities, of the type of European scientists in the nineteenth century. Even Israel suffers today from these difficulties.

6. The scientific development of a new country should be carefully planned; it will take several generations. Two conditions must be fulfilled in order to make this development possible at all: a well-organised education and the creation of a group of high-level technicians. From these technicians, the future scientists will emerge.

7. What are the projects a new country should undertake? It should imitate the history of human development as a whole. The first requirement is the production of food of a variety necessary for a balanced diet. It is almost a law of nature that the new countries are characterised by a diet rich in carbohydrates, which does not permit a high level of human productivity. Therefore, the first requirement is the expansion and regulation of agriculture. Secondly, the country must survey its natural resources, both plants and minerals. In the third stage it can embark on industrial development, first of all in the direction of the utilisation of agricultural produce and agricultural surplus.

8. The two plans, the development of a technically (and later, scientifically) trained layer of the population and the development and utilisation of natural resources, should be executed in parallel. Whilst science is often said to be incapable of being regulated and directed, no new country can avoid strict planning of its technical and scientific effort, until such time that it has an excess of scientific manpower.

9. The more experienced nations can advise their newer sister countries, but the latter must make all the effort themselves. The new countries should avoid being dazzled by the more esoteric aspects of modern science. A case in point is atomic energy. As Francis Perrin has rightly pointed out in his presidential address at the 1958 Geneva Atomic Energy Conference, atomic energy in new countries is only feasible, if the country has sufficient scientists and technicians to carry out the heavy task itself, without having to rely on experts from abroad.

TECHNOLOGY AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

J. Freymond
University of Geneva, Switzerland

The revolutionary technical changes brought to the world by the continuing industrial revolution must necessarily bring profound modifications of economical and social structures and of relations between political forces. The lack of information and the impossibility of measuring the effects of one sector on another would make it very difficult to assess the rhythm of the technical progress and, therefore, of the time necessary for the politician to implement suitable action; but we may at least be able to see the direction in which further research on the problems of the influence of technical changes on international relations should be pursued.

First we mention the influence of military technology on international relations. Although the industrial potential of a state might be important, what is considered by the military chief is the availability at the proper time of arms and equipment - whence the classical armaments race, which, as scientific development proceeds, becomes a technical advancement race. The temptation to take advantage of the momentary superiority given by the availability of a decisive weapon is greater nowadays than in former times, but the impossibility of knowing exactly the opponent's power and the fear of reprisal lead to an equilibrium by terror. As a result, the struggle becomes transferred to economical and political grounds.

The study of the influence of technology cannot be limited to its effects on the struggle among powers. One should also consider its consequences on the daily lives of men and of nations. If modifies the economic, social and political forces inside states, among states and among continents. The tendency of technology to create uniformity and standardization should make it a means of bringing people together and a constructive factor in the international community, but the resistance of traditional environment is so powerful that technology becomes instead a tool in the service of egoistic interests of the nations.

THE IMPORTANCE OF TECHNOLOGY

Sir Ben Lockspeiser, K.C.B., F.R.S.

The two-thirds of the world who live in the undeveloped areas are in revolt against poverty. They have become aware that the 'scandal of rags' under which they have lived for thousands of years need not be and ought not to be. We, the industrialized countries, have outgrown our initial tendency to ignore the problem. We are also beginning to realize that money alone is not enough, that the money and effort expended should have produced better results.

The material world we live in today in the advanced countries has been largely shaped by science, and clearly science will be a large determining factor (perhaps the largest) in helping the poor countries to their feet. The international store house of fundamental scientific and technological knowledge is available to all, but there is a scarcity of technologists where they are most wanted to adapt tested techniques and know-how to local needs and to cope with new problems. High priority should therefore be given for making proper provision for technological training, as has been profoundly realized in Russia and China. But education implies teachers, and this is where sufficient help from countries with advanced educational systems would count most.

The pattern of living of a country should be largely determined by knowledge of natural resources. If a country is fortunate enough to be well endowed, it can fashion its economy with a large measure of freedom. Otherwise, it must find an acceptable niche for its economy to weather the economic climate of the world. Sufficient trained people must be mobilized to undertake the necessary surveys and to interpret the results.

Mr. Paul G. Hoffman has recently brought into sharp focus this need for 'pre-investment activity'. According to him, our large investments in low-income countries have failed to be fully effective because of the absence of adequate knowledge of their resources and lack of trained people to make effective use of the resources that are available. This is the heart of the matter.

A SCIENTIFIC APPROACH TO TECHNICAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

G.D. Arsenis, E.P. Gyftopoulos,
E.N. Carabateas and R. Moissis
Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Cambridge, Massachusetts

It is generally recognized today that the impersonal market forces do not lead an ailing economy along its optimum path of growth. To overcome well known obstacles of imperfections and indivisibilities, long range technical and economic programs are necessary.

Conventional economic development programs may begrouped in two categories. The first category consists of programs which aim at enhancing the economic activity of a nation without attempting to alter the sectoral structure of the country's economy. The second category is composed of programs based on the recognition of certain pathological conditions (e.g., mass unemployment, low productivity, etc.). The programs attempt to eliminate these conditions by means of government-sponsored projects and encouragement of private initiative.

Both types of programs are fundamentally defective: the first type because it assumes, a priori, an optimum distribution of the productive forces; the second type because the choice of the objective is axiomatic, and not a result of scientific study of the economy.

A third alternative is what the authors call 'National, Technical and Economic Development Programs.' These programs have scientific merits as applications of the modern theory of economic growth to the problems of underdeveloped countries. The development of such programs involves three stages of study.

First, a detailed study of the presently existing economic structure. This includes the establishment of a representative number of production and consumption functions, and the detaildd estimation of the available labor force, the level of the natural resources, etc.

Second, a consideration of all possible combinations of the economic activities, and mathematical determination of the optimum combinations (i.e., determination of the dynamic Pareto efficiency curve).

Finally, if the existing situation differs from the optimum, the program should suggest several procedures, each based on different value judgements, for eliminating the gap. The final choice of a particular procedure, is, of course, left to the responsible government.

The demands of such studies in technical, mathematical, and computational skills, make a close cooperation between scientists of a large variety of specialties, essential to the implementation of the program.

1. The word 'scientific' is not used here in a narrow sense, referring only to the use in industrial and commercial enterprises of specific scientific tools or techniques, such as cost accounting, quality control, linear programming, data processing, industrial design, automated production, psychological testing of personnel, operations research, etc. Rather, we are referring to a scientific approach and attitude - questioning, imaginative and systematic - toward the problems of coordinating and directing the efforts of the human resources or organizations. Indeed, we mean simply the use in industrial enterprises of the scientific principles of definition, analysis, experimentation, observation, classification and generalization.

2. The scientific management movement, which began in the United States with the work of Taylor on machine shop operations (the so-called 'science of the task'), has progressed and broadened out into a developing science of adjusting individuals to tasks, arranging and correlating tasks, and directing and motivating groups.

3. There is a growing need in the entire world economy for efficient, scientific management. In the industrialized countries, scientific management is charged with the task of achieving even higher living standards and greater economic power. In underdeveloped countries, scientific management is required to achieve industrialization in the shortest possible time in order to feed growing populations, to raise living standards and to guarantee economic independence to match the recently acquired political independence.

4. With special reference to newly independent countries, it is now recognized that, while modern technology permits jumps from primitive productive facilities to the most advanced, it requires effective management to have these facilities produce on the scale of which they are capable. Management talent is as important a resource as labor, capital and natural resources. As a matter of fact, the faster that industrialization steps are taken, the larger and more complex the enterprises set up, the greater the economic innovations involved, the more efficient management is required.

5. Management talent can be obtained in four ways, with the fourth way as the most efficient and desirable method for the long pull. First, foreigners can be brought in to build and run their own enterprises; secondly, foreign experts can be brought in to run locally owned enterprises; thirdly, nationals can be sent abroad to study; lastly, a pool of management talent can be created by management training within the country by means of schools, institutes, etc.

6. Israel has gone through and is going through all of these steps and is thus a good case history for other newly independent countries. As one of the 'old' new states, Israel already has a twelve year history of industrial development at a pace and scale applicable to other new countries. Furthermore, the participation of government, the non-industrial background, etc. also provide other parallels which make Israel's experiences in the industrialization an object lesson for others.

7. The history of management development in Israel. First came Histadrut sponsorship of productivity councils. In 1950, the Productivity Institute was formed and devoted its main efforts to job analysis and the problems of increased production. Then, within the Productivity Institute, the need for broader management courses was recognized. From these initial efforts, the Israel Management Centre was born. In a little over a year and a half of existence, the Israel Management Centre has concentrated on middle and top management problems of existing enterprises. However, Israel's plans for industrial expansion call for the training of over 5,000 new managers for new and existing plants. As a major effort to break the bottleneck of management talent and to build a reliable source of managers, the Israel Management Centre is launching a Management School in October 1960.

8. Israel is ready and willing to share with other newly independent countries the benefit of its special experience of fifty years of 'natural' growth compressed into ten. In the field of management training, Israel is ready to supply advisors abroad to help set up training programs, productivity institutes, management centres, etc. Israel also welcomes the participation of nationals from other countries in its own management courses.

9. Scientific management is needed by all countries who have made rapid industrialization a primary aim. Fortunately, the professional manager can do essentially the same efficient job regardless of the economic, political and social system of the country in which he works; scientific management is in its essence neutral and non-political. Furthermore, experience has shown that fears regarding the possible political ambitions of a rising class of professional managers are unfounded. As it increases its membership and functional importance with the industrialization of a society, the managerial class becomes less exclusive. And the trend toward professionalization turns its interest and its energy ever more inward as, true to its professional outlook, it becomes increasingly involved in the growing complexities of the operation of modern enterprises.

10. There are, however, moral problems in all management. Management implies a system of authority and, unless management has a high moral purpose, its activities can become merely manipulative or dictatorial.

THE EXPERIENCE OF GREECE ON THE APPLICATION OF SCIENCE TO A DEVELOPING ECONOMY

K. Alexopoulos
Department of Physics, University of Athens

Greek economy, in the last 140 years, has passed through various stages of growth and now can be described as finishing the "take off" period of Rostow's classification. The various disciplines of scientific knowledge that can be of use to the present period are discussed. Advanced science seems, under the present circumstances, to be of importance to agriculture and a few other economic fields such as geology, fishing, etc., but not to industry. The wider dissemination of basic technological knowledge is urgently needed in all fields. This survey reflects the opinion of a number of scientists mainly occupied with applied research. Examples are given of cases where science was of immediate help to the economy; of cases where the wider use of research might have avoided disastrous delays. One of the reasons for distrust in research may be that it does not necessarily solve problems immediately.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF AFRICAN FRENCH-SPEAKING COUNTRIES

Gabriel Lisette
Vice-Premier of the Republic of Tchad, Minister Counsellor of the Community

Introduction: THE ROLE OF RESEARCH IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES.

First part : Demographic and Social Factors.

The coexistence of two separate elements, one of a foreign origin, the other of an autochthonous origin does not raise special problems because of the considerable numerical inequality of the two elements and their different distribution in the various divisions of economic life.

The autochthonous population, essentially rural, is unequally distributed geographically. Some areas are overcrowded, others are practically unoccupied. On the whole, the average density is low. But because of the improvement in the standard of living, the rate of increase of those populations is very high. This creates problems for the future.

Second part: Economic factors

The resources are almost exclusively soil and sub-soil products. On the other hand, industrial production, although improving, is still rather low.

The scarcity of rural manpower combined with a lack of technical skills traditional to the culture slows the development of industry dependent on manpower.

Foreign trade is usually based on one or two export products which explains the extreme fragility of the economics. They are on the whole expanding, but essentially oriented towards the franc zone.

The states are dependent on the outside world for their energy resources.

They are therefore particularly sensitive to the two factors 'distance' and 'transport'.

The economic studies started several years ago have shown low individual incomes, the importance of the non-monetary sector in the national product and of the tertiary sector in the local economic structures.

Third part: The phenomena of growth.

Since 1946, with the help of France, the African French-speaking states have systematically attacked the various obstacles which impede their economic and social development.

Considerable progress has been achieved. It allows us to think that the decisive step yet to be made is not unattainable, but for its realisation the states still remain dependent on outside aid in technicians and public or private capital.

Conclusion :

Material investments alone are not sufficient.

The importance and role of human investments and the civic cooperation of the nation.

SCIENCE ON THE STRUGGLE AGAINST HUNGER

Josué de Castro
President of the World Association of Struggle Against Hunger

Recent scientific progress in the field of agriculture and nutrition has been extraordinary, and the perspectives are that future progress will be still more spectacular.

On the basis of the latest development in soil science, agricultural technique and genetics, it has been possible to force world food production up at a faster rate than the increase of populations. This was accomplished both by bringing new areas into cultivation, and by increasing the productivity of lands already under cultivation. The theory of Malthus, according to which the world does not have sufficient possibilities or potentialities to permit the natural growth of population, the excess being condemned to death by the niggardliness of nature, has thus been entirely demoralized.

The application of nuclear energy in the field of agricultural science will certainly lead to still more spectacular results, making possible the use of sup-polar and even polar regions, as well as different types of desert. As the scientist James Bonner states, this suggests that it will be easy to find food resources on the earth to feed a population many times greater than at present. Dr. Bonner, indeed, goes so far as to say that food production could be multiplied 500 times.

Through increase of fertilizer production (some fertilizers being made with nitrogen taken from the air), through the synthesis of various essential chemical products and the promise, before long, of the miracle of photo-synthesis, chemistry steps forward to complete this picture of radiant hope for humanity in the field of food resources.

Here are some few examples of scientific conquests which await this broader application for the benefit of humanity:

It has been demonstrated that it is perfectly possible, by the use of low-cost energy, to remove the salt from sea water; this water could then be used for irrigation of great desert areas which in many cases are contiguous to the oceans.

But the soil is not the only place where man may look for new sources of food supply. There is also the great domain of the waters-rivers, lakes and seas - whose untold food riches have as yet been hardly touched. Modern science has shown that marine plankton constitutes an extraordinary food reserve, exceptionally rich in food value and perfectly adaptable for human use.

The progress of science in the field of food and agriculture has thus demonstrated that the Neo-Malthusians, who insist that births must be controlled in order to save the world from the dangers of hunger, are talking nonsense: the world is a long way from having too many people.

Consequently, we should not be frightened by the fact that each day in the world there appear 80 thousand new mouths to feed, provided they are matched by 80 thousand brains to think and create and 160 thousand hands to work and to produce.

All that is necessary is that the world proceed to a greater utilization of its creative potential and a broader application of human imagination, applying the latest conquests of science to the social field. This will resolve, once and for all, the Malthusian dilemma, the problem of finding enough food resources for a better, a rational alimentation of the growing world population.

HUMAN SCIENCE AND MODERN WORLD

LESSONS ON THE FRENCH PETROL EXPERIENCE

by R. Navarre
General President Director of the French Institute of Petrol

Communication presented by J.C. Balaceanu
Scientific Director at the I.F.P.

The economic evolution of the modern world, tends to concentrate a bigger part each day of material assets of an underdeveloped part of humanity. Most of the techniques appear incapable, it is true, of opening to newcomers, that is, the least favoursome. The access to natural wealth, strictly necessary, however, to satisfy the needs of an ever-growing population, justly anxious to reach a better living-standard.

We shall analyse the technical nechanism of this accumulation of wealth in two decisive examples for the lives of nations: that of discoveries of new petrol resources, and that of using them on a large scale, and we shall show by the light of recent French discoveries at the Sahara, chemical works developed at the French Institute of the Petrol, that this mechanism has nothing definite, and that it is possible not to use it thanks to fundamental rules.

Most of the petrol fields have been discovered for reasons arising out of the encounter of happy circumstances: existence of accumulation spots particularly obvious, benefit of a nearly gratitious prospect. Since then, a very favourable conjecture has been established, of the extension of these fields: because the first producers have been able, very often, to fix prices which would allow them to auto-finance their prospect. The techniques, therefore, turned rather to the development of existing fields than to the discovery of new ones. The new undertakers working, very often, as a set-off in more difficult regions, have to borrow in order to finance their undertaking and have even more, to prospect in little-known regions having, consequently, a very inferior output to that of works of simple development.

The same unfavourable conditions to beginners reappear in the domain of chemical transformations. The refining and petro-chemical installations have become more and more complex and cannot be naterialised for a reasonable price unless they reach a minimum size. They are prisoners to a determined fabrication and appear obsolete after a certain period which is becoming shorter and shorter. Their benefit is more and more limited in large, rich, concentrated and highly populated countries.

This general collapse of the new enterprise is, therefore, not the consequence of some malevolent plot, but the result of a fatal evolution as long as a factor of innovation does not intervene.

However, the geology and the geo-chemistry teach us that a workable field is the result of a whole series of phenomena : materials have been piled up, transformed, handled again, sometimes transported, heaped up in traps which have preserved them up till now and protected them from alteration agents at the same time.

The understanding of this evolution, of the phenomena which accompany it, of the physico-chemical traces which it must have left, permits to reconstitute the necessary surroundings for the existence of the field and to foresee the sites and the formations where the best conditions have been able to be gathered. Thus, scientifically guided, the discovery in unknown countries catches up with handicap, and some of the French results at the Sahara, where the discovered reserves of drilled metres, have been 335 times higher than those which classical statistics would result, have been the best witness.

In the same way, in chemical and refining matters, fundamental study permits the conception of simpler and more economical processes. The thermodynamics and, even more, the chemical kinatics permit to define the favourable conditions in the optimum process of the searched reaction, to check the development of the parallel or consecutive parasite reactions which, by the loss of raw-materials which they entail and above all by the operations of fractionation to which they lead, burdens the fabrication.

After such a study, the searcher can provide the engineer with all the necessary elements for the conception and the calculation of a simple, selective procedure, economical in raw-material and energy. Such a process, conceived on a fundamental basis, is lasting because it is perfectible with difficulty, and can act on a small scale bringing to people whatever the force of their nation, the benefit of the technical progress.

Thus, for many States, and new States, the industrial problems of extent only rarely find economic solutions in the industrial classical techniaues, developed in countries where the considerable advantage of having been the first to use such wealth intervene. But the industrial delay may have been fulfilled faster and for a lower cost using processes which follow better the rules of nature and merely using their manifestations and the indications.

True, not all is known, and in fact, in the large geological syntheses, in the analysis of phenomena, competing on the formation of a field or on the rules of the evolution of the chemical systems, something will have to be done; but searchers and engineers who have been trained for the courageous tasks in half-certainties, educated to the frequentation of the unknown will be able to stand the rules of reasearch to which they have been initiated, the methods allowing to conduct and control their observations and realisations; these searchers will bring to the industry the innovations introduced by science, while those engineers will be able to take them quickly in charge and develop them with wisdom.

Suchlike are the principles which preside the French technical intervention in petrol matters as well as the formation of its framework. The success has appeared sufficient enough so that many countries like: Iran, India, Argentina, Greece, are interested in these methods which aim at the development of a better technique, better inspired with fundamental knowledge and consequently more effective and more satisfactory to the needs of Mankind.

NEW SCIENCE OR OLD TECHNOLOGY

By Professor P.M.S. Blackett

One of the difficulties of treating adequately the vastly important problems of the development of the new and underdeveloped states is the number of diverse subjects with which one must be concerned: economics, sociology, science, technology, the history of the developing countries as well as those which have not, all are relevant. It has been aptly said that if everyone only talked about the subject on which they were expert, a deathly hush would descend on the world: I will not add to this hush but will rashly venture into many of the specialized fields.

As a natural scientist with a numerical turn of mind I will attempt to express the magnitude of the problem in a few highly simplified figures. In the non-Soviet world there are some 400 million people with an average income per head of about $1,000, and some 1,000 million people with an average income a head of $100. Within the groups there is a wide range of wealth, with the U.S.A. a t the top with over $2,000, the U.K. with $800, Israel about $400 and India and many other countries with income between $50 and $70 a year. In this discussion I will be mainly concerned with the problem of what I shall call the 100 dollar countries.

It is worth while considering for a moment some of the historic factors which have led to their 10 to 1 difference in the wealth of these two groups of nations. Broadly, of course, this has resulted from the scientific — technological revolution which took place in North West Europe towards the end of the eighteenth century. This has led to an increase of wealth of the industrialized countries amounting to about 2% per year cumulative, giving in a period of 150 years or so a rise in wealth of a factor of about 10. Historians seem to think that, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, there was probably not a great difference between the wealth of Europe and of China, which seem then to have been the most developed of the Eastern countries. However, China remained rather static in wealth per head till quite recently, as also did India. So we see that the 10 to 1 difference in wealth between the most culturally advanced nations of the West and the East are historically very recent — in fact it has come about within the last 200 years. The reasons for the remarkable growth of the Western countries and the static condition of the Eastern ones during the last 200 years are highly complex and are essentially of social and political origin and have nothing to do with any difference of innate ability. If a man from Mars had arrived on the earth any time between 3,000 B.C., 500 B.C. he would undoubtedly have concluded that the people of the Near and Middle East were the superior beings of the earth: between 500 B.C. and 1500 A.D. he would have decided in favor of the Chinese and Indians. The problems of the now poor and underdeveloped countries, many of which have been centuries ago the greatest of nations, is how to produce the social, political, economic, educational, technical and scientific environment to ensure a steady growth of wealth at least at 2% per head year, and preferably considerably more: this means a 4% or more increase of total material wealth a year to take into account the rise in the population. There are two main reasons why it is vitally important that the 100 dollar countries, now little above the subsistence level, shall quickly start on the path of continued growth. In many areas, particularly S.E.Asia, a population explosion due to the impact of modern medicine is imminent and if the process of economic growth and industrialization is long delayed it will become increasingly difficult. Then, many of these countries have adopted the Western system of parliamentary democracy and this is not likely to survive unless it can achieve an adequate rate of growth of material well being. There are other political systems in the world today, which are already in fierce competition in the race for human material betterment: in particular, the very rapid growth of material wealth in Soviet China, which may amount to 10% a year or more, provides a stimulating challenge to the other countries of S.E.Asia and of Africa.

I agree with those who hold that if the decade of the 1950's has been characterized by the Cold War, the decade of the 1960's will be dominated by competition in rates of social and material progress. It is not the political system which can put the biggest satellite in orbit, which will win lasting honor, but that which provides the greatest increase of human welfare.

If I am right in holding that speed is essential in the power of initiating the growth of the 100 dollar countries, then it is clear that it is important not to wait for new scientific and technological developments to be made. The planning of the initial process of the growth process must be based on known technology and not rely prospectively on new science. If new and valuable technological developments do arise, as surely they will, then they must be considered as providing windfall profits to the emergent economies; but they must not be assumed for planning purposes.

I want to say a few words about "Research and Development" in relation to new production methods, machines or processes. Many natural scientists do not realize how long and expensive is the process of going from a laboratory discovery to a marketable product. A new drug, perhaps accidentally discovered in the laboratory, may cost millions of dollars to develop to the commercial stage. New technologies, of great potential value to the emergent countries, such as desalination of water, solar power, weather control, nuclear power, must clearly be energetically pursued, but then development will be long and costly and some will fall by the wayside. Moreover, even those which do succeed technologically, and which, when costed by conventional methods, appear to show promise of economic economy; are likely to be expensive in initial capital outlay - their ultimate economy will depend on savings over many years in manpower. Now it is just capital which is in shortest supply in the emergent countries, and manpower is often abundant. So many valuable technological developments may initially, at any rate, be out of the economic reach of the 100 dollar countries.

One can deduce from such arguments that science is no magic wand to wave over a poor country to convert it into a rich one.

Now if one looks at the immediate problem of the developing countries, it is clear that there is in the world already far more technology, in the form of scientific knowledge, technical know-how and material goods, particularly production goods, than any but the richest country can afford to utilize.

So when the emergent countries go shopping in this World "Super Market" for technical know-how and production and consumption goods, they must compile a shopping list, embodying a rational choice of priorities. The late Anuerin Bevan once said that socialism could, in one aspect, be considered a religion of priorities.

Many things in life are desirable - the problem is which are the most important. Only the people of the emergent countries can settle this: but they must decide on a shopping list otherwise they may come home with plenty of sweetmeats but no bread and butter.

Before, however, an emergent country even thinks of going shopping, it is essential that it have trained personnel in adequate supply, both to advise as to what to buy — wide technical knowledge is required even to read the catalogues - and to make use of the goods when bought.

In the field of manufacturing industry, communication, power and exploitation of mineral wealth, the emergent countries' primary need is for capital to buy the required goods and for mechanics, artisans, maintenance engineers, administrators, entrepreneurs and civil servants to make best use of them.

In agriculture the problems are often more concerned with the task of improving methods of husbandry than of applying sophisticated technological innovation. However, it is certain that great increases in the use of artificial fertilizers, pesticides, weed killers, as well as agricultural implements and machines will have to be imported. But to get full use of well known methods may mean long and difficult social revolution in the countryside. New scientific research is needed - local problems depending on the particular climate, terrain and crops, but the research should start with a full knowledge of what has been achieved elsewhere in the world. Would it not be true to say that the great development of agriculture in Israel has owed much less to the test-tube than to the spade?

In the field of public health, clearly an adequate medical science is the first requirement. Without this the already known medical knowledge cannot be applied. Moreover, even good medical services and the latest drugs cannnot do much till the whole way of life of the mass of the population is improved: improved food, hygiene, housing and water supply are essential. It may be a matter of astonishment to future historians that a generation of men who had the genius to provide the whole world with penicillin had not the sense to provide more than a small fraction of its population with baths.

However, in the field of medicine there is urgent need of much new scientific research, particularly related to the special diseases of the tropical and semi-tropical region of the world. This is so vital that a greatly increased combined international effort is urgently needed. International organizations such as WHO and FAO, and "matching" research teams recruited from both the developed and under-developed countries, and the cooperation of the large industrial drug and antibiotic firms are essential.

The affluent 1000 dollar countries of the world have a vital role to play in helping the development of the emergent $100 countries. The first and most important need is for sympathy, understanding of the problems and difficulties of the emergent countries, and I am convinced that this Conference will prove very valuable in this respect. I personally hope also that the $1000 countries will recognize the humanity and wisdom of providing more generous help in money and men to help quicken the growth of the $100 countries. Just because of the huge 10 to 1 difference in material wealth, I am convinced that they could do so with little material sacrifice to themselves and with much more benefits. In my view our urgent need is to start in each of the affluent countries a campaign to educate the public in the needs of the emergent countries and the ways in which the affluent countries can but give them help. I feel that many of the participants in the Conference will go home to their homelands greatly stimulated to take an active part in tackling this, the most vital problem of the next few decades.

PROBLEMS OF NEPAL

Address by P.B. Koirala
Prime Minister of Nepal

Mr. Chairman and Fellow Delegates:

In this august body here are assembled some of the outstanding men in modern science and in other branches of knowledge to discuss the problems of lesser-developed nations and make recommendations for accelerating the advancement of these nations. Without claiming any knowledge on the science of this fundamental question whatsoever, I wish to put before the fellow delegates here some of my practical observations on the subject borne out of my experience and work in the lesser-developed country of Nepal. I am particularly happy for getting this opportunity to do so.

The consequences of World War II were not just the triumph and tragedy of the victor and the vanquished. Its impact was felt even in the remotest corner of the globe, and the citadels of imperialism and colonialism were swept away in quick succession. The countries of Asia and Africa awoke from the slumber and suppression of centuries and drove back the colonial powers to where they belonged. Countries which had long lost their identity thus gained nationhood, and many new nations emerged in Asia and Africa.

Strictly speaking, Nepal is not a new nation of this type. It is an ancient land figuring in the oldest legends known to man. Through the ages, it maintained its political independence and followed its own tenure of life as a forbidden kingdom. In the hundred year period between the second half of the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth, it was under the despotic rule of a small family which closely resembled the colonialists for its merciless exploitation of the country for personal benefits. In 1950 the people of the country staged a unique and successful revolution which ended the autocratic regime in the country. Contradictory as it may sound, it is in this sense that Nepal is a new country much in line with the other Asian and African countries that have been coming to birth since or following directly as a result of World War II.

That the democratization of Nepal and the liberation of her Asian and African friends took place over the same period of time, was not just a matter of chronological coincidence. To say that, viewed from a higher altitude, both form part of a tidal wave of resurgence sweeping over the vast continent of Asia, will also miss the point unless it is clearly understood that democratized Nepal and the newly liberated states of Asia and Africa share the same heritage of under-development, industrial backwardness and an antiquated system of agriculture and feudal type of landholding and face the same unsolved problems of hunger and disease.

Because of the differences of background, the problems might differ in degree and emphasis, but in general outline there is fundamental unity not only in the nature and the variety of the problems but in the availability of resources to cope with them too. In general terms the problem is that of a country trying to live up to the complexities and responsibilities of the twentieth century, which is equipped with the tools of the seventeenth or eighteenth century.

The new nations of Asia and Africa lack today even the basic minimum of developed nations. With independence they have before them and around them problems which are highly dangerous to independence. Their newly won sovereignty and independence may mean nothing if they are not able to solve these problems quickly. But these are problems with deep roots and they defy easy solutions. When we look into these specific problems, we feel despondent and do not know where to start. It is essential, however, that we should have a thorough understanding of these specific problems.

Of the specific problems facing the new nations of Asia and Africa, poverty is one of the most important problems of our times. Poverty in these countries is a legacy bequeathed by history. It is such a stupendous problem that the temptation is there to write it off as insoluble within the immediate future. It is true that in most of these poverty-stricken countries the foundation of democracy is laid with a government responsible to the people, and politically the people are more conscious than ever before. They recognize and value their democratic right. These fundamental factors have naturally given aspirations to the masses, and they anxiously await for the day when democracy will deliver them from hunger. But there exists hardly any economic means which could be quickly developed to produce enough to feed these people. The great question mark, therefore, is how long they can continue to go hungry in their enthusiasm to enjoy and develop their political consciousness.

In spite of all our dedication and determination to bring about all-around development in our respective countries, the problem of administration continues to baffle us. We have inherited an administrative machinery of the old autocratic or colonial system which was basically designed to enforce law and maintain a tranquil society with all its ills and cruelties of ruthless exploitation. No matter what we may be asserting, corruption and graft continue to corrode this field. The welfare state on the other hand calls for a different attitude and intellectual discipline. We have got to orient the whole system of administration, and it takes time to raise a new cadre of administrators thus oriented. To instill into the minds of these cadres the purpose of a new administration competent to handle and implement fully all our development plans is a stupendous task. Though training programs have been started, competence has to be acquired by being in the job and by gaining experience. This is a slow process and is proving a bottleneck to all states embarked on a program of rapid development.

The task of the new states of Asia and Africa determined to bring about revolutionary changes in the economic setup of their respective countries is made all the more difficult by the dearth of technical knowhow and the extreme shortage of technical personnel. In all development programs a more serious bottleneck is the shortage of technicians of all types and grades. Lack of technical knowhow and technical skill in the people in general, results in low productivity, low national income, and a consequent low standard of living. Unless the new nations find out means of acquiring technical knowhow and train people fast enough to man the jobs to implement the development plans, all our efforts may remain pious intentions only.

One of the outstanding problems of the new states is also the problem of psychological adjustment. Democracy has been introduced in these countries but democratic tradition is not strongly entrenched in the hearts of the people, and psychological change has yet to take place in the outlook of the people. In the absence of a proper administration and technique, there is a strong tendency to abuse rights and liberties. Forced to live for centuries under a government alien to their wishes and desires, they have an ingrained habit to view the government with suspicion. They have yet to realize that government under a democratic system is an instrument not of exploitation but of partnership in the glorious adventure of national reconstruction. Those who have taken up the role of opposition also display a complete lack of understanding of this vital aspect of democracy and tend to be irresponsible and harmful to democracy itself. It is, therefore, not an easy task to change the psychology induced through centuries of misgovernment.

The inheritance of extremely limited financial resources is another serious problem for the new states. These new states will find it extremely difficult to survive unless they can bring about a quick pace of economic development in their countries. In these countries planning for prosperity is apt to fall in a vicious circle. Development calls for investment but the people are so impoverished that to ask them to tighten their belt a little more may mean in practice to advise them to go hungry. Developed countries seem to think that a slightly higher rate of taxation could be our solution but in this context people forget that in these new countries taxation itself is a new thing and as such it would be highly erroneous to lean on it heavily as is the practice in developed countries. Reliance on the growth of indigenous capital alone is also not a practical proposition for the moment. Foreign aid as private investment and loans appears to solve the problem considerably. But these again take a long time to materialize, not to mention the conditions in which alone they are attracted, like stability, credit-worthiness of the borrower, the existence of an infra-structure and a favorable climate for private enterprise. Ways have to be found to cut short the procedures, to ensure the minimum of investment, domestic and foreign, and to economize on the cost of building up of the infra-structure. These are indeed questions not easy to solve.

Peculiar conditions prevailing in our part of the world have shown that certain countries have discarded democracy as a method for national development. Today, therefore, there is the question of economic development by democratic or dictatorial methods. Lack of true opposition and imperfect psychological adjustment after independence seem to have lent popularity to dictatorship. The slow moving progress under a struggling democratic system also has provided opportunity for dictatorship to catch up fast the imagination of the people of Asia and Africa. Democracy as a political system or a way of life is on trial in the countries of Asia and Africa. The criterion is whether it can deliver the goods. The change in the political system has focused the attention of the people on whether it can solve the age-old problem of poverty. They have suffered for so long that they clamor for quick results and unless democracy can do something about it there is a distinct fear that the people may look to more extreme left sources for a fulfillment of their wishes. That events may have taken such a turn is amply borne out by some of the recent happenings in Asia and Africa.

National development is the imperative need. Of the two alternatives one postulates force, regimentation and suppression of liberty while the other connotes argument, persuasion and fullest exercise of individual freedom. We stand for democracy and civil rights. We are also of the conviction that democracy is the superior method for national development. The pace of democratic process need not be necessarily slow. Popular cooperation is not necessarily a factor of regimentation. Democracy can very well enlist it, and we have practical experience of it. In the field of cooperative post office, we have made that experiment and the mass participation in it was so enthusiastic that only recently we celebrated the setting-up of the hundredth cooperative post office. In the recent Freedom-from-Hunger Campaign Week the members of the government got down to the actual field work, and the subsequent response from the people was so tremendous that it gave us ground to believe that the spectre of hunger can be banished from the country. All, therefore, we have to do is to provide a climate of mass participation which, of course, has got to come from the leadership. The creation of such a leadership is the great responsibility of the new democratic states for on this depends the success or failure of socialism in these new states where the fascination for dictatorship is always a danger.

It is here that the advanced socialist countries have a significant role to play if the young socialist countries of Asia and Africa relying on democratic methods are to be saved and secured from the dictatorial or communist alternative. Those nations who within the democratic framework have successfully battled for the socialist ideal of peacefully narrowing down the unequal distribution of national wealth, raising the standard of living of the masses, providing the minimum working hour and wages, guaranteeing employment and running a number of social services, have now no such ideals to grip them and all their activities are now confined to national policies only. They should now set before them the ideal of solving the pressing problems of young democratic nations and also shoulder the historically supreme necessity of making available to their less fortunate socialist friends the technical knowledge and personnel they have gathered in the course of years and also the financial resources they have at their disposal.

The advanced socialist countries of Europe and elsewhere are no doubt fully aware of the challenge of the times. They also realize the critical phase of history through which other socialist countries are passing. They are alive to the dangerous alternative remedy to which the people in their despair turn. So despite the gravity of the situation and the urgency of the problem, the new socialist countries of Asia and Africa retain their confident optimism that the millions of Asians and Africans who prefer socialism as the creed of their life irrespective of differences in race, color and religious faith, have not done so wholly in vain.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES
The Weizmann Institute of Science,
Rehovoth - Israel

August 19, 1960

ADDRESS BY S.E. IMOKE, Minister of Finance, Eastern Nigeria

Ladies and Gentlemen:

What you expect of me this morning is what every other chairman at this Conference has been doing - the simple duty of just introducing the various speakers to you. And this morning the first speaker is Professor S. Adler, O.B.E., F.R.S., M.B., Ch.B., Educator and Parasitologist at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem since 1928. He was born in Russia in 1895 and was educated at the University of Leeds, the School of Tropical Medicine, Liverpool, and the University of London. He served as Medical Officer in the British Army from 1917 - 1920; Senior Research Assistant at the Sir A.L.Jones Research Laboratory, Sierra Leone from 1921-1924. He settled in Palestine in 1924 and was Research Fellow at the Hebrew University from 1924 - 1929; Associate Professor, 1928-29. He was in charge of the Joint Kala Azar Expedition of the Royal Society and the Hebrew University from 1930 - 1932. Later he was appointed Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at the Hebrew University in 1948. But before I call on Professor Adler may I, Ladies and Gentlemen, crave your indulgence to take this opportunity to thank the Organizing Committee of this Conference for the great honor done to me and to my country, the Federation of Nigeria, in appointing me to the chair for this session. With all respect to the Organizing Committee, may I deviate from the strict duties of the Chairman to present formally to the Prime Minister and people of Israel in general the warmest greetings of the people of Nigeria. It is common knowledge that there has already developed between us and the people of Israel strong bonds of friendship and we are ever grateful for the tremendous amount of aid both financial and technical which we have and are receiving from this country. I should also express the gratitude of my country to the Weizmann Institute and to Mr. Abba Eban, President of the Institute and Minister of Education and Culture, through whose initiative this historic get-together of the great masters of Science and Technology on the one hand and Politicians and Statesmen on the other has been made possible, for affording us the opportunity of participating in it.

You will no doubt appreciate that on the eve of independence it is not easy for the Prime Minister of the Federation of Nigeria or his immediate colleagues, who are pre-occupied with the arduous task of giving the finishing touches to the work of preparing for the great occasion, to be absent from the country. Nevertheless, I am happy to say that the Federation of Nigeria is adequately represented by as many as six delegates and that I have been specifically requested by the Prime Minister, Sir Abubakr Tafawa Balewa, to present the cordial greetings of his people to the Conference and the people of Israel on this unique occasion.

My country, by the definition put forward by a previous speaker and the Chairman of the opening session of this Conference, has yet a few more weeks to go. We are, so to speak, not yet a "New State" but we look forward with enthusiasm to the 1st of October when the independence of our country will be declared and from which time we should properly come within the fold. Be that as it may, there are only a few at this Conference who have not already learned of the unique position which Nigeria occupies in the Continent of Africa by virtue of its size which is 373,250 square miles, its population of 35 million people and its vast resources which range from mineral oil, now known to exist in commercial quantities, tin, lead-zinc, coal and iron-ore to cash crops such as cocoa, cotton, palm-oil, ground nut, rubber and timber. Many of these other resources still lie fallow awaiting development.

I do not propose to take up any more of the Conference's time by attempting to elaborate on the problems of my country as many of you are fully aware of these. We are ourselves fully conscious of the need for economic development and we are indeed aware of the fact that we must hurry if we are not to be left behind in the race for progress. The race is indeed not for the indolent. I am happy to say that today every Nigerian politician knows that he cannot long remain in office unless he and his party can create those conditions which enable the people to find more and better employment and enjoy higher standards of living. This was clearly indicated by Professor Lewis earlier on. While the emphasis today is on economic development, we do not imagine that at the present stage we can go it alone. We have received and are receiving assistance of all kinds from various countries and international organizations but we still require more. Professor W. Arthur Lewis has told us that loans are now available in plenty from the World Bank and other agencies. I can assure him that although this may be true these loans are not easy to come by. On the other hand, I do hope that older countries will note the hint which he has given and here I quote "It is equally important to provide money for services which cannot be financed by borrowing because they yield no financial return - for services such as education, research and survey, or public health. Ideas of foreign aid have swung in recent years more and more away from grants towards loans, and this is a mistake, since the need for improvements in education, in surveys and in other public services is just as great as the need for investment in revenue-yielding enterprises." I should therefore like to say to those groups of countries described at this Conference as the $1000 countries, which are willing to cooperate in the great mission of assisting the under-developed countries, that we welcome any assistance which they may find it possible to offer.

I think it is proper for me at this stage to say that it would appear to be the desire of all the participants at this Conference, especially those of the new states, that this Conference should become a regular feature in World affairs. Much as I would personally love to see the Conference held again in Israel, whose hospitality you will no doubt agree has been outstandingly generous, I accept, not without some reluctance, the view point which I have heard expressed in some quarters, that the venue of the Conference should rotate, particularly in the new countries.

Finally, ladies and gentlemen, I hope you will permit me to make the following observations: First I refer to the conspicuous absence of our friends of the East, the Soviet Union, one of the two World Powers which on account of their advanced scientific and technological knowledge hold the destiny of mankind in their hands. To my mind, the issues facing this Conference cut across the boundaries of political ideologies. It is my earnest hope, therefore, that at no distant date the countries of the Eastern bloc will join in the great crusade that has been launched here at the Weizmann Institute, of harnessing scientific and technological knowledge for the benefit of their less privileged brethren, here on earth, before proceeding with the rather ambitious but nevertheless legitimate program of "space flights" and trips to the moon. Secondly, we who belong to the new countries regard this Conference as a challenge thrown on our behalf, to the older countries and we look forward to seeing the challenge being seriously accepted. We do not ask for the moon nor are we anxious for a trip there with you just yet. All we seek is your guidance, assistance and cooperation in our efforts to gather the treasures of our lands so that we may rise above the subsistence level to a life more abundant.

I now present to you, ladies and gentlemen, Professor S. Adler.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES
AT THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE • REHOVOTH, ISRAEL • AUGUST 15-30, 1960

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES.

I

The International Conference on Science in the Advancement of New States, being held at the Weizmann Institute of Science, Rehovoth, Israel, concluded its first week of sessions on Friday, August 19, 1960. During that time it dealt with; Economics, Education, Medicine, Nuclear and Solar Energy and Social Problems.

Following the opening ceremony on the Memorial Plaza of Yad Chaim Weizmann on Monday afternoon, August 15, the first business session was held in the Michael and Anna Wix Auditorium under the chairmanship of Mr. Moshe Sharett, member of the Knesseth (Israel's Parliament), and a former Prime Minister and Foreing Minister of Israel.

The gathering at the opening session filled the hall with over 500 statesmen, scientists, scholars and observers from Israel and other countries. The native costumes of the Afro-Asian delegates added splashes of color to the auditorium.

Mr. Meyer W. Weisgal, Chairman of the Institute, who presided, welcomed the delegates and guests. He expressed the hope that the Conference may initiate deeds to solve problems which faced many of the participating countries.

Prime Minister Mr. David Ben-Gurion greeted the assembly and in his concluding remarks said: "It is my fervent wish that you may succeed in your deliberations which are devoted to strengthening cooperation between men, fostering the unity of all mankind and speeding up the economic progress and culture, advancement of every man and woman throughout the world, without distinction of race, color, class or religion."

Mr. Abba Eban, Minister of Education and Culture in the Israel Government and President of the Weizmann Institute of Science, who is Chairman of the International Conference, delivered the key-note address. He dwelt on what he called the "formidable and inspiring" responsibility which suddenly faced leaders of newly liberated nations in Asia and Africa.

"The problems which they face cannot await the kind of solutions which evolve across many generations," he said. "Human urgencies are acute.. Most of the new nations have put their faith in democratic methods of government, and their leaders look around for a key to accelerated progress. Their eye falls in expectation and wonder on the contemporary scientific movement, with its record of immeasurable triumphs and its even more radiant promise for future years.

Continuing, he said that the Conference sought to deepend confidence among national leaders in the modern scientific movement as one of the sources of their progress and salvation. "Ideas and methods are accessible which can mitigate the agonies and defects which beset new societies. These ideas and methods affect the central problems of their population, their health, their land and their resources." Every state, no matter how small or young, could achieve its own family of research workers who could keep their nation in touch with the scientific world of thought and action. The new communities entering their new "births of freedom" would largely determine how the story of mankind would ultimately unfold.

After reviewing some of the human issues which the Conference must tackle, Mr. Eban said, "We of Israel are, by the fortune of history, a member of the modern world of science and technology. The Weizmann Institute in which we work was frankly and avowedly established by its founder as a citadel of scientific enquiry dedicated to the progress of a young pioneering nation. We are also one of the new states of the international community, a partner in the modern enterprise of national liberation. We thus stand in simultaneous kinship to the scientists and to the representatives of new states here assembled.

Dr. W.A. Lewis, President, University College of the West Indies, Jamaica, read a paper on "The Problems of New States." He dwelt on the financial aspects of scientific and technological procedures to be applied by the new states. Education must be given a new focus. The current fashion was to spend lavishly at both ends of the scale, and to neglect the middle: to spend lavishly on university education and on attaining the goal of universal primary education, while neglecting secondary education in its various forms. Many of the countries concerned needed people at the middle level; agricultural agents, nurses, laboratory technicians, practical engineers, elementary school teachers, bookkeepers, secretaries, and a stream of other such people, trained in secondary and vocational schools.

In his paper on "The Impact of the Physical Science on the World of Today", Sir John Cockcroft, O.M., F.R.S, Nobel Laureate in Physics, Master of Churchill College, Cambridge, England, dealt mainly with the rapid development of present-day technology.

Sir John said that the major human problem at the end of this century would be "to find means of keeping food and population in balance and the control of the powers of destruction which the developments of physical science have placed in the hands of statesmen." He made one confession as a physicist: "Discoveries in chemistry and biochemistry seem to have a shorter time lag than in physics. Antiobiotics, sulphur drugs, plant hormones, and synthetic weed killers have transformed medical practice and the expectation of life.

Prof. P.M.S. Blackett, F.R.S., of Imperial College, London, England, a Nobel Laureate in Physics, in his paper on "New Science and Old Technology" stressed the fact that science was not a magic wand "to be waved over under-developed countries in the world, turning them rich overnight." He told the overflow audience representing 31 countries and five continents that, developing countries must make their plans on the basis of existing technologies and should regard all new scientific developments which come along as "welcome windfalls."

Prof. Blackett continued, "It is vital that countries should develop speedily because a great population explosion, due to the greater use of preventive medicines, was still to come. In fact, the rate of growth of human welfare in poor countries was going to be a decisive factor during the next decade.

During the session on Economic and Social Problems of New and Developing States, Mr. Nyuk Lin Yong, Minister for Education for the State of Singapore, gave a detailed review of the educational system and structure of his country, which is an island of 225 square miles with a population of 1.6 million. Turning to economics, he said that the Malay States' problems revolved around the alarming fact that without resources they had the highest known rate of population growth in the world.

Dr. Rochefort L. Weeks, President of the University of Liberia, outlined the history and development of his nation of 1.5 million, and reviewed its salient economic problems. He said: "Liberia, like other under-developed countries, looks forward to the day very soon when its industrial development programs will get under way. In this process of development and change, there is no doubt that science can and will play a major role."

Dr. Celso Furtado, Coordinator of the Development Program for North-East Brazil, described Brazilian economy in the mid-twentieth century as "Thirty years of deep changes which have transformed a mere constellation of economies, peripheric to the world market and with the typical dynamics of the colonial system, into an industrial economy whose growth process is expressed by an increasing differentiation at higher productivity levels with a structure even more complex."

The Prime Minister of Nepal, P.B. Koirala, explained that although Nepal was not a new nation in the contemporary sense of the phrase -- it had figured in the "oldest legends known to man" -- the 1950 revolution which brought democracy to her, took place over the same period of time as "the liberation of her Asian and African friends." Democratized Nepal, said the Prime Minister, and the newly liberated states of Asia and Africa shared the same heritage of under-development, industrial backwardness and an antiquated system of agriculture and feudal type of landholding, and thus face the same unsolved problems of hunger and disease.

"It is true," continued Mr. Koirala, "that in most of these poverty-stricken countries of Asia and Africa the people are more politically conscious than ever before. They recognize and value their political rights and freedom. The great question mark is how long will their enthusiasm to enjoy and develop their political freedom compensate for their hunger and misery. The problem of administration continues to baffle us. In all development programs a more serious bottleneck is the shortage of technicians of all types and grades, and the problem of psychological adjustment to government under a democratic system."

Prime Minister Koirala added that democracy as a political system or a way of life was on trial in the countries of Asia and Africa.

Mr. Gabriel Lisette, Vice-Premier of the Republic of Chad, discussed the specific and unique problems of the emergent French-speaking African states. He dealt in particular with the special population problems of these areas. "What we want in new countries is not charity, but cooperation. We want a partnership in which we can maintain our dignity and selfrespect." These states, he said, looked to Israel as the country in Which Dr. Chaim Weizmann had built science into the character of the State. Political independence was only one of the pre-conditions of independence.

The session on Energy, was opened by Dr. Jules Gueron, of the Atomic Agency of the European Community (EURATOM). The basic theme of his address was the application of atomic and thermonuclear energy processes. He outlined its promise and problems, and analyzed the scale of investment in development lands in terms of money and manpower. He emphasized that, for new states, the by-products of atomic reactors held a number of immediate possibilities. But nuclear power had to be regarded strictly from a long-range viewpoint.

Questioned whether there could be a replica of Euratom among small states, Dr. Gueron said that some sort of cooperation would be worth while in fields wherever possible.

Dr. Alvin M. Weinberg, Director of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory, Tennessee, U.S.A. lectured on the possibility of achieving energy autarky (self sufficiency) by the use of breeder reactors. (Breeder reactors manufacture more fuel than they consume, using granitic rock).

Dr. Weinberg said he did not wish to encourage the statesmen present to go into the nuclear business in their new states. He urged that most of them should wait until breeder reactors had been developed. He expected that these would become economic for certain areas in fifteen years time. He also warned about radioactive waste, saying that no large-scale nuclear energy program should be started until the problem of waste disposal had been solved.

He went on to say: "I think that an economically autarkic world would be a more stable place than an economically interdependent world. There are many examples of how concern for energy supplies, or for other raw materials, has led to acute anxiety and tension. The Suez crisis, 1956, is only one of many such crisis which can be traced to worry over energy supplies. One need only imagine the course of events at Suez had all the countries involved at that time been truly self-sufficient in regard to energy. If their energy systems had been based on domestic uranium and thorium, and if the problem of conversion of nuclear energy into petrochemicals were solved, it is hard to see how access to the Middle East could have been a major political issue."

Mr. J.A. Jukes, Economic Adviser to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, delivered a paper on "The Economic Prospects of Nuclear Power in New States." The areas of the world where nuclear power was likely to be installed in this decade, were those advanced industrial countries which were short of cheap conventional fuel but had plentiful capital resources; it would require a country with a large demand for electricity and with integrated transmission and distribution networks. Obvious candidates were some Western European countries such as Britain, France, Italy and in the east Japan.

"One-quarter of the world's population uses four-fifths of the world's energy. The other three-quarters will sooner or later claim their share. Some new states have insufficient indigeneous reserves of energy to support a major program of industrialization and expansion, and are therefore looking to nuclear energy as a means of meeting their potential requirements. In the long terms, they are undoubtedly right. The question is one of time."

Mr. Jukes divided the economic growth of countries into four stages: the Transitional, Take-Off, Drive to Maturity and High Mass Consumption. "New States, in the economic sense, are those at or near take off." He said that in his opinion Israel was near the maturity level.

New states, he said, had no need to rush into new technology, and thus consume valuable resources, scarce scientific manpower and capital. He advised statesmen of new countries that they could afford to wait: "You can use the time to train your own scientists and technicians, so that they can gain experience in a more moderate way."

Prof. B.S. Benjaminov of Rose Polytechnic Institute, Indiana, U.S.A., thought the conference had discussed nuclear energy usefully, if only because it brought home to representatives of new states that such activities were as yet beyond their means.

Delegates took special notice of two papers presented by Israeli scientists. The first by Dr. Henry Tabor of the National Physical Laboratory of Israel, dealt with solar energy, a subject which could solve a most vital problem for developing countries.

Dr. Tabor described a solar pool which he had built near the Dead Sea Works at S'dom. According to Dr. Tabor's system, salts are dissolved at the bottom of a pool. This makes the bottom layer of water heavier, and this density prevents it from rising to the surface even when it has become hotter. Although the top layer remains at the same temperature, because it loses heat at the same rate as it picks it up, the lower level of water gradually gets hotter, provided that it remains undisturbed.

Dr. Tabor reported that a pool of one square kilometer would produce heat valued at $300,000 annually and would cost $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 to construct. He estimated that it would produce 6,000 kilowatts of electricity whenever the sun was shining. The cost of installed capacity would only be about $250, per kilowatt, which was below the estimated cost per kilowatt of nuclear power stations when these became operative. He said that the requirements for building such a pool were flat land, plenty of salt, and hot sun. There were tens of thousands of square kilometers of such land in the world. Most undeveloped countries generally had considerable quantities of these three requirements. Salt was frequently present in flat areas where very large pools could be built.

Commenting on Dr. Tabor's scheme, Dr. Alvin Weinberg said that it was the most important statement he had heard so far at the conference. Most of the official delegates showed the deepest interest in the scheme, which they regarded of immediate practical significance.

The second Israel scientific paper which evoked considerable interest was presented by Mr. A. Zarchin of Tel Aviv. Its subject was "Desalination of Sea-Water by Freezing."

Commenting on the water problem, Mr. Zarchin's paper read: In considering ways of de-mineralizing sea water (unlimited supplies) it is not possible to exaggerate the possibilities for producing constant cheap supplies of water at all times and seasons for drinking, irrigation and industry.

The entire world faces the very difficult problem of lack of water and is searching for ways of solving it. In addition to the ever-increasing development of agriculture and industry, augmenting the demand for sweet water, the only source of supply remains rain water, whose quantity has neither changed nor increased since the six days of the creation.

As an example: 2-3 square meters of plantation need one cubic meter of water to fructify once a year; a steel works needs 200 cubic meters of water for each ton of steel; a sugar factory needs 10 cubic meters of water per ton of sugar. In the United States, water requirements amount to six cubic meters per person per day, and in more than 30 large towns, the expansion of industry has been restricted because of insufficient sweet water.

Mr. Zarchin reported that according to his estimate, the investment needed will be $300 per cubic meter a day for small extractions up to 500 cubic meters per day, and $50 per cubic meter a day for extractions of over 100,000 cubic meters a day, apart from the cost of land, buildings, power and administration.

"In Israel," Mr. Zarchin's statement pointed out, "because of the increasing needs of agriculture and new settlements during the last few years, the increasing demand for water could not be met from our only source, which is the Jordan, even if that were entirely in our control. On more than one occasion, the Negev (the desert in the South of Israel) has been colonized with water and then deserted when the water failed, as witness biblical history and archeological discoveries.

"In Israel, with our restricted areas for agriculture, the possibility of producing cheap water in unlimited quantities has a special significance, as with sufficient water for irrigation it would be possible to get three to four harvests a year.

"The freezing process offers a fundamental solution to the problem. The process is based on the phenomenon that ice produced by sea water is free of minerals and on melting becomes sweet water. The cold from the ice can be used for the continuation of the freezing process for new portions of sea water. The process can be operated in three ways:

more

1) Through mechanical instruments needing power, producing 2-3 kilowatt/hours per ton of desalted water;

2) By distilling instruments (injectors working by water boilers or mercury) needing 1.25 to 1.5 kilograms of oil per ton of water;

3) Solar energy (evaporating pools).

Every new process, Mr. Zarchin concluded, can be improved in use, but great benefits await the overcoming of any initial difficulties, in the use of these processes.

Prof. Aharon Katzir of the Weizmann Institute, spoke on the history and philosophy of the second industrial revolution which began in 1945. While in the first revolution, he said, man succeeded in harnessing mechanical forces, and in extending the realm of the human hand, the second revolution introduced electronic devices which were capable of supervising the operation of machines, and thereby extended the realm of the human brain. Thus, while the symbol of the previous revolution was the weaver loom or the steam engine, the symbol of the revolution which came into power after the Second World War was its electronic brain. The social implications of these developments were so far-reaching that nobody could predict at this moment the shape of society to come. Manual labor was going to be superseded.

Prof. Kessar Alexopoulos, of the Department of Physics, University of Athens, Greece, read a paper on "The Experience of Middle Eastern States on the Application of Science to Developing Economy". Giving experiences in Greece, where science had proved helpful in some cases and might have helped in others, he cited the instance of a hydrological survey to find water in limestone. With gratitude he spoke of the help given in this case by the Israeli geologist, Prof. Leo Picard of the Hebrew University.

Prof. B. Milosaljevitch, of the Faculty of Agriculture at Belgrade University, Yugoslavia, stressed the fact that rapid development demanded application of the latest achievements of science and techniques as well as of the development of research. But methods applied in one country were not necessarily applicable in another. People must be trained to find their own solutions for their own local problems.

Dr. Julius Gikonyo Kiano, Minister of Commerce in Kenya, said that his country considered Israel both an inspiration and a challenge because it had overcome so many problems that the newly-liberated states had to face. He pointed out that Kenya was suffering from a shortage of teachers and scientists, but was sending students to study abroad in countries such as Israel, England, India, Pakistan, New Zealand and Australia.

A plea to consider both fundamental and applied research was made by Dr. Gabriel A. Johnson, Assistant Director-General of Health in Togo. Unfortunately, he said, the research worker was regarded in many countries as an unproductive citizen. The training of scientists took many years but meanwhile the new countries must have access to more information and centers of documentation.

Rev. Solomon Caulker, Vice-President of Furah Bay University, Sierra Leone, appealed to the Conference that it should grapple with specific problems of countries such as his own, where eight out of 10 babies were doomed to die within the first year of their life. Other delegates supported Rev. Caulker's stand, including Prof. Zacharias and Dr. Gueron.

Rev. Caulker declared that the most vital problem was longevity, a problem the conference should tackle. He spoke about the process of transition of his country from British Colonial rule to independence (Sierra Leone is receiving its independence on April 27, 1961). The next stage in development, after political freedom, was the re-education of the people from their age-old superstitions and customs to modern-day thinking.

Prof. Eyo Ita, Director, West African People's Institute, Eastern Nigeria supported Rev. Caulker's statement that, scientific teaching and research should be related to the basic economic needs of each state. He said that people of Western Nigeria are interested in building up friendship and peace with Israel and neighboring Arab Countries. "I hope we can learn here (in Israel) how to channel mankind's mental energies into solving these problems. If we can get peace between Russia and America we, the young states, can join in building a better world."

Another appeal for the solution of immediate needs came from the Togo representative, Dr. G.A. Johnson, Assistant Director of Education. He proposed that central laboratories should be established for groups of countries. Dr. Johnson added that the Weizmann Institute was an example of such institutions and should be considered a central part of the education of developing countries.

Dr. Weinberg said: "The Weizmann Institute is successful because it is built on the tradition of 200 years or more of western science. To build a Weizmann Institute in the middle of the African jungle, even if it were an institute wherein all African countries were represented, would be a very inadequate answer.

Prof. Louis D. Smullin, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, U.S.A., on the other hand said that the suggestion for regional, multi-national, technical research centers was sound. They would be working on technological ideas which would produce immediate results in accordance with their own needs.

Prof. Rolando V. Garcia, University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, mentioned that older "new countries" in Latin America, such as Argentina, held an advantage over the newer countries by the fact that, a century ago when they obtained their independence, schools in mathematics and science were established, although at that time there was little need for them. New countries required particularly geographical, climatic and soil surveys to ascertain what resources they possessed.

A young student from India, Mr. Mantara of the Bhoodan movement, who is on a seminar course in Israel, lauded the kibbutz (collective agricultural settlement) system in Israel, and said that students at these kibbutzim, at the age of 18, were already fully equipped with scientific and technical knowledge and a wide background of literature and history.

The last session of the first week dealt with Medicine and Health. Dr. G. Brock Chisholm, C.B.E., M.C. from Canada spoke on "Mental Health and Advancement of New States." Dr. Chisholm stated that modern developments in nuclear, chemical and biological weapons have changed the very conditions of survival of the human race to the extent that major warfare, previously regarded as normal, has now become synonymous with national or even racial suicide. All these changes have made new and complex demands on mankind.

"Very large numbers of people must make extensive and deep changes of their systems, beliefs, attitudes and loyalties," said Dr. Chisholm, and added that there is an urgent need for extensive research in fields of child development towards maturity. "It may be necessary for newly independent states to make a number of changes in the education of their children."

Dr. Marshall H. Brucer, Oak Ridge Institute of Nuclear Studies, Tennessee, U.S.A., discussed Atomic Energy and Medicine. He dealt chiefly with radiation hysteria problems, nuclear medicine, radiation accidents, methods in clinical study, isotopes and irradiation treatment, and the organization of medical science. Dr. Brucer reviewed various aspects of nuclear medicine treatment and therapy, giving examples of pre-clinical courses at Oak Ridge for physicians as well as applied techniques and special laboratory for more advanced researchers.

Prof. S. Adler, F.R.S., Hebrew University, Jerusalem, analyzed parasitic human and livestock diseases which have decimated the Continent of Africa. He explained that an African "failed to keep pace with his cousins because the cards were stacked too heavily against him." He said no other branch of the human race could have done better. Vast areas of Africa were denied the use of domestic animals as sources of energy because of the tsetse fly. This made the human muscle the prime source of energy throughout Africa, and this was obviously inadequate.

He discussed present day advances in preventive and curative medicine and research and said of the three main diseases caused by parasites the most serious was schistosomiasis, transmitted by various kinds of snails.

A solution to this major, tragic problem was the building and maintenance of public health laboratories, launching of chemical industries and the creation of wide-scale public health and educational services. Livestock and man on the African Continent must be freed of this dreadful curse. "Eliminate the fly and use the land wisely," said Prof. Adler.

If anything, concluded Prof. Adler, he had understated the magnitude of the problem in Africa, where man was subject to epidemics and diseases such as sleeping sickness, which deprived him of food and transport. While not unique to Africa, malaria, hookworm and other parasitic diseases were nowhere as acute. Sixty or 70 years ago nothing could have been done to help the people of the new states to help themselves, but now it was possible. The first priority was to establish public health and hospital services and expand those available, to create further research laboratories, maintain and improve services already established by Colonial regimes, tackle local sanitation problems and set up veterinary services throughout Africa.

Dr. Martti J. Karvonen, Worker's Health Institution, Helsinki, Finland, said that history had shown time and again that the greatest wealth of a nation was not its natural resources, but its people. No other country perhaps was a better demonstration of this than the State of Israel, which had convened this meeting.

He described methods whereby any nation would become aware of its medical problems. Finland led the world in cardiovascular diseases and he explained in detail Finnish efforts to establish its causes. Delegates listened attentively to his description of research organizations in the nationwide tests of dietary studies, population examination -- a concrete picture of techniques of modern epidemiology. Dr. Karvonen said that each country must do a certain amount of its own research, as each country had its specific health hazards. Israel, said Dr. Karvonen, was well served with intelligent research and studies.

more

Discussions after the sessions emphasized several points, highlighting the urgent needs of new states in the next fifteen years.

1. The necessity of short-range programs carried out with the help of societies wealthier in capital and know how, rather than long-range benefits from science.

2. The immediate need to train administrative and technological personnel.

3. The need for small power units rather than huge energy reactors. Dr. Henry Tabor's solar pool received favorable reaction, as did the recommendation by Dr. Abraham Frankel, Technion, Haifa, that wind power might be usable. Mr. Zarchin's presentation of desalination of sea water also made a deep impression on the Conference, especially on new states suffering from a shortage of sweet water.

The first intimation that the Conference become "a regular feature in world affairs" came from Finance Minister, Dr. S.E. Imoke, from Eastern Nigeria. Dr. Imoke said that Nigeria has received and is receiving assistance of all kinds from various countries, but more was needed. He continued: "I think it proper for me at this stage to say that it would appear to be the desire of all participants, especially those of new states, that the Conference become a regular feature in world affairs. Much as I would personally love to see the Conference held again in Israel -- whose hospitality you will no doubt agree has been outstandingly generous -- I accept, not without some reluctance, the viewpoint which I have heard expressed in some quarters that the venue of the Conference should rotate, especially in new countries."

Dr. Imoke added that he regretted "the conspicuous absence of our friends from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, one of the two world powers, which because of their scientific and technological knowledge are a powerful factor in the destiny of mankind. To my mind the issues facing this Conference cut across the boundaries of political ideologies. It is my earnest hope, therefore, that at a no distant dat countries of the Eastern bloc will join in the great crusade that has been launched here at the Weizmann Institute, of harnessing scientific and technological knowledge for the benefit of their less privileged brethren here on earth, before proceeding further with ambitious programs of space flights, and trips to the moon."

"We, who belong to the new countries, regard this Conference as a challenge on our behalf to the older countries. We do not ask for the moon, nor are we anxious for trips to other planets. All we seek is your guidance, assistance and cooperation in our efforts to make use of the treasures of our lands so that we may rise above subsistence level to a more abundant life."

Prolonged applause greeted this statement which sums up the purpose of the Rehovoth Conference. From the general feeling it would appear that a "blue print" for mutual aid arrangements among participating states and others who may join at a later date, will emerge from the deliberations at the Weizmann Institute.

What may become known as "the Rehovoth Program" is in the process of materializing, with the ultimate aim of a series of mutual aid schemes and the chanelling of outside technical and financial aid to needy states.

(A Round-Up of the second and last week of the Conference will be made available.)

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES

AT THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE • REHOVOTH, ISRAEL • AUGUST 15-30, 1960

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE IN THE ADVANCEMENT OF NEW STATES.

II (last part)

Awareness by delegates from Afro-Asian nations of the role that science and technology can play in the development of their countries, and a plan whereby such knowledge can be brought to these emerging states, will be credited to the International Conference on Science in the Advancement of New States, which convened at the Weizmann Institute of Science, Rehovoth, Israel from August 15 to 25.

Immediate concrete results were the agreements reached between the State of Israel and 16 states of participating nations, for cultural and technical cooperation. Requests from Israel were principally for the sending of experts and for the granting of study-scholarships in Israel in the fields of general education, health, industry, agriculture and general development.

The problem of how mankind will feed itself as its population approaches an aggregate of 6,000,000,000 by the end of this century opened the second week's discussions on "Food, Nutrition and Eugenics" at the International Conference.

Prof. Minoru Tachi, Director of the Institute of Population Problems in the Ministry of Health, Tokyo, Japan, discussed population trends and economic developments in Japan from 1872, when the first Japanese census was taken, until 1960. Tracing the growth of governmental interest in population control, Prof. Tachi stated that in 1948, a Eugenic Protection Law was passed, making "induced abortions" no longer illegal and providing designated physicians, in certain instances, for artificial interruption of pregnancies. Prof. M.C. Shelesnyak of the Weizmann Institute stressed the importance of understanding and utilizing the actual reproduction processes for the regulation of population.

The same subject was also discussed by Mr. M. Willcox Perrin, Chairman of the Wellcome Foundation, London, England. The upward rush of the human population by the end of the twentieth century is a direct, rapid result of advancement in the knowledge of biological sciences and the large-scale application of technology and medicine, said Mr. Perrin. "Medical knowledge brought about death control and to achieve an effective balance between population and food supply, it is necessary to regulate the growth of the world's population."

The coming population explosion was tied to the exhaustion of natural resources by Prof. W.C. Lowdermilk of Berkley, California, U.S.A. "Civilization is running a race with famine and the outcome is still in doubt. This challenge confronts more particularly new nations arising in less developed regions of the world", said Prof. Lowdermilk. "Participants may see for themselves how, in Israel, with diligent application of science, engineering and hard manual labor amazing results can be achieved. Israel as a pilot plant was more instructive (than highly developed countries) because an abused land had been redeemed."

Marine algae as a potential food commodity to solve nutrition problems of the western world was suggested by Prof. Atsushi Watanabe of the Institute of Microbiology, Tokyo University, Japan. "The seas of the world occupy more than seven per cent of the whole surface area of the globe," he said. "Vegetable products such as marine algae are utilized only slightly in foodstuffs compared with the utilization of land plants." Of the over 10,000 species of microalgae known to exist, few are directly used as foodstuffs, and their significance as a source of vitamins and body minerals has been overlooked. Prof. Watanabe added.

During the session on "Science and Education", Prof. Gunnar Randers, Director of the Institutt for Atomenergi, Norway, stressed the importance of the need for informed public opinion on technical development. "Citizens must learn to understand and appreciate the increasing influence of modern techniques on our society," he said.

Prof. Jerrold K. Zacharias, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, U.S.A., reviewed the work of the United States Physical Science Study Committee which he heads, and explained the methods of teaching intensive physics by inexpensive and vivid techniques, which other countries could adapt to their own needs. "Science is a human endeavor and our picture of a physical world is one of the triumphs of human thought. Children who will be the men and women of the future, will be responsible for solving world problems through science." Prof. Zacharias added that his Committee in the U.S. was ready to send teams of experts to new states if asked to do so. The first request for immediate guidance and assistance by Prof. Zacharias' Committee came from Mr. Yong Nyuk Lin, Minister of Education, Singapore.

Prof. Mogens Pihl, Department of Physics, University of Copenhagen, Denmark, spoke on the training of scientific personnel for newly developing areas. "Where a well established training tradition does not exist one must rely partly on overseas experts, or training of local students abroad," commented Prof. Pihl. He recommended a system of briefing advisers and hiring foreign experts, preferably from countries of a more or less similar development stage rather than from highly developed countries. Prof. Pihl also stressed teaching in secondary schools. "It is of great importance that teaching in science be planned jointly by universities, teachers training colleges, technological secondary and elementary schools." Prof. Pihl also advised the setting up of regional training centers for highly qualified student training.

Mr. Aaron Wiener, Director General of Israel's Water Planning Committee, dwelt on the problems of water development in arid countries. Mr. Wiener discussed planning procedures for the development of water resources. In developing a water policy, he said, a country should follow the initial trial and error practice by rapid engineering of high-priority projects. In the meanwhile, data can be collected for creating a Master Plan, which will of course require continuous revision.

Dr. E.G. Bowen, Chief, Division of Radiophysics, Australian Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization, dwelt upon cloud seeding and the large scale experiments carried out on this problem in South Australia. It has now been well established, he said, that silver iodide acts as an effective freezing nucleus in supercooled clouds which have a temperature of 6°C. or cooler. If other conditions are satisfied if, for example, a cloud has adequate water content or is relatively long-lived and of sufficient depth, seeding with silver iodide may induce a useful rainfall. In the completely arid regions of the world, the chances of inducing a rainfall by this method are small, but in semi-arid regions in which the right type of clouds are known to occur, this method could bring about important changes in the agricultural economy.

Prof. Louis J. Battan, Department of Meterology, The University of Arizona, said that experiments in Arizona on cloud seeding were similar to those in South Australia.

Dr. Frank W. Parker, Assistant Director General, Technical Department, Food and Agriculture Organization, read a paper on the role of Chemical Fertilizers in Increasing Agricultural Production in Under-Developed Countries. He pointed out.

Chemical fertilizers which provide plant food in accordance with soil and plant requirements, along with other improved practices, have doubled or trebled crop yields in many countries. Their use on a very extensive scale is essential for adequate agricultural production in Asia, the Near East, Africa and Latin America. The Food and Agriculture Organization and its member countries, with the assistance of the fertilizer industry throughout the world, are initiating a Fertilizer Program as part of the Freedom from Hunger Campaign.

Dr. Lloyd V. Berkner, President, Associated Universities, Inc., New York, U.S.A., explained how geology and geophysics could be applied to the advancement of nations as well as to the exploration of natural resources. Man has today only a fleeting record of geophysical history on which to base his estimates of the future. Man cannot avoid the premise that in an era of exploding population, one great hope of improving man's welfare lies in most exact and advanced studies of every aspect of his environment, and the exploitation of those studies in applied geoscience.

Prof. Ernst D. Bergmann, Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, Israel, warned new nations not to imitate science in the form in which it has been developed in highly industrialized countries. The scientific development of a new country should be carefully planned. Two conditions must be fulfilled in order to make this development possible: a well organized education and the creation of a group of high-level technicians. The most urgent priority for new countries was to explore their natural resources. Prof. Bergmann suggested the establishing of working groups to discuss in detail the various subjects, and an international body to plan scholarships for exchange students and professors.

Mr. Abba Eban, President of the Weizmann Institute of Science, summed up the motive force of the Conference, which he said was bridging the difference between one part of the world and another in science and technology. The need for practical results from the Conference was acute. Mr. Eban said that he hoped that the Weizmann Institute of Science, which initiated the Conference had served as a catalyst for new developing states of Asia and Africa.

Immediate positive results from the Rehovoth Conference was the signing of a mutual aid agreement by Mr. David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister of Israel and Mr. B.P. Koirala, Prime Minister of Nepal on August 22. A plan was drawn up for "technical and other assistance and joint enterprises in the fields of agriculture, industry and construction works" whereby Israel will send a group of experts to Katmandu, Nepal, shortly. Scholarships for specialized and general training of Nepalese personnel in Israel are also being arranged.

The government of Cameroon will shortly send a delegation to Israel to conduct talks on economic relations and technical aid, it was stated by Minister of Public Health, Mr. Pierre Ninyin Kamden. The Minister who heads the Cameroon delegation to the Conference is the 24-year old son of the Chief of one of Cameroon's largest tribes. He said that on his return to Tahome, he would submit a series of recommendations designed to strengthen relations between the Cameroons and Israel. Scholarships for Cameroon students to study in Israel were also planned.

Abbe Fulbert Youlou, President of the two-week old Republic of Congo, who participated in the International Conference, before leaving Israel discussed with Mr. Izhak Ben-Zvi, President of Israel, the Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, cultural and technical cooperation in various fields, as well as the organization of courses for training Congolese leaders in Israel.

Scholarships and other opportunities for studying in Israel were announced by Mrs. Golda Meir, Minister for Foreign Affairs. The present 700 foreign scholarships will be increased to 1000 for Afro Asian students. Mrs. Meir said that the scholarships would be for men and women and would be available in parallel English and French classes. On behalf of the Weizmann Institute, Dr. Gerhard Schmidt, Chairman of the Scientific Committee announced that the Institute is ready to accept graduate students from new states wishing to complete their Ph.D. studies in the fields wherein the Institute is engaged. He said that the Weizmann Institute had available immediately a number of scholarships for the maintenance of students from Africa and Asia, and will try to give preference to those branches of science which promise earliest returns, such as biodynamics and chemistry. "We will be glad to share the experience we gained in building our own Institute as a free and unfettered center of research, with countries of Asia and Africa, and assist them in the design of such centers. These activities on our part -- training scientists and aid in planning research centers -- we consider to be major contributions which the Weizmann Institute can make to the scientific development of new states. We shall also encourage members of our senior staff to visit your existing institutions to lecture and assist in research," said. Dr. Schmidt.

Other scholarships are being planned by the Hebrew University, the Technion, Histadrut, ORT, Israel Atomic Energy Commission and the Institute for Forest Products and Fibres.

At the final session a declaration known as "The Rehovoth Declaration 1960" was adopted by the Conference.

The full text reads:

An International Conference on Science in the Advancement of New States was convened by the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovoth, Israel from August 15 - 25, 1960 on the invitation of the President of the Institute.

The Conference was attended by Ministers, high government officials and leaders of educational and development institutions from many countries, including those recently established as sovereign states, as well as by leading scientists, scholars and economists from all parts of the world. Specialized international agencies were also represented.

The Conference directed its attention to two processes which have deeply affected the life of this generation -- the swift progress of science and technology and the change in the structure of the international community through the emergence of new states, mainly in Asia and Africa. The participants in the Conference expressed general agreement on the following points:

1. The new states have achieved political equality with older establishes states. But no such equality yet exists in economic, social and cultural progress. Most of the new states suffer from depressed living standards; low life-expectancy; slowness of development in agriculture and industry, and inadequate use of natural resources. The scientific thought and technical skills which could correct this situation are not yet being applied to the new states. Thus, the modern scientific movement is constantly increasing the strength and wealth of advanced countries, while having little corresponding effect in the less developed territories.

more

2. It is urgently necessary to reduce this disparity both on human grounds and in order to further the welfare of states and to create a more harmonious atmosphere of international relations.

3. The natural and social scientists participating in the Conference were agreed that science and technology are capable of bringing about swift improvements in the conditions of new states, through improved agricultural methods; water development; the prevention of disease and the promotion of health; improved nutritional techniques; the discovery and evaluation of resources; the mutual adjustment of resources and population; and the stimulation of industrialization. Emphasis was laid on the need to strengthen scientific education in developing states.

4. It was further agreed that in many areas of research and application, such as the utilization of nuclear and solar energy and the increased availability of fresh water by artificial processes, developments in the next decade may well have a positive effect on the economic conditions of developing states.

5. The representatives of new states revealed a strong desire to expand scientific education in their countries, to utilize the best scientific methods relevant to their development problems, and to maintain close contact with scientific thought and action in scientifically advanced countries.

6. The following lines of thought and action were recommended at the Conference with a view to bringing science and technology to bear more positively upon the problems of developing countries:

(a) The governments of developing states should regard the furtherance of science and technology as a major objective of their national policies and make appropriate provision for funds and opportunities to achieve this end.

(b) In the secondary and higher educational systems of new and developing states accelerated programs should be undertaken with a view to establishing a body of scientific workers and technical experts.

(c) An early step in the activities of new states should be the undertaking of a thorough survey of natural and human resources as the basis for a development plan with a clear indication of priorities.

(d) Until such time as their own scientific manpower is adequate, new and developing states would be well advised to seek the help of scientific advisers and experts from friendly countries and international agencies to help them develop a scientific practice and tradition.

(e) States which have made advanced scientific progress should, as a matter of policy, be willing to extend scientific aid and advice to states less scientifically advanced.

(f) Scientific institutions and research workers in scientifically advanced countries should increase their preoccupation with those fields of research and application which are relevant to the problems of new and developing states.

(g) International agencies, governments and foundations should carry out expanding programs of financial aid for developing states, with due emphasis on the transmission and diffusion of technical knowledge, the training of technicians and the increase of technical and scientific equipment.

more

(h) It was generally agreed that the kind of contact developed at this Conference between the governments of developing states and leaders in various scientific and technological disciplines should be intensified and broadened to include the mutual elaboration of specific plans in furtherance of the objectives herein outlined.

7. To carry out the purposes and plans outlined under the preceding paragraph, the Conference decides to set up a Permanent Bureau which will maintain contact with the participants in the Rehovoth Conference and with other governments and institutions supporting its general aims. The Permanent Bureau will serve as a clearing-house and forwarding agency for requests and suggestions from developing states and from scientific workers and will try to promote fruitful contacts.

The work of the Permanent Bureau will consist of representatives of the participants in the Rehovoth Conference as elected by the plenary assembly.

The Permanent Bureau will consider the convening of a Second Conference at a suitable time, after consultation with Governments, scientists and international agencies, in order to review the progress made on the matters proposed under Section 6 of this Declaration.

The Permanent Bureau Committee will report to the Second Conference on its supervision of progress on joint or individual activities and programs.

8. The Conference decides to publish its proceedings for distribution to governments, scientific institutions and international agencies.

9. The Conference decides to despatch this Declaration to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to specialized agencies, governments, institutions and Foundations concerned with scientific research and with the advancement of developing states.

Rehovoth, August 25, 1960.

Mr. Edward R. Morrow.

Dear Mr. Morrow -

Thank you for your voiced ~~the~~ skepticism of the Contents of the Democratic Platform of 1960.

We, as a people, have many many problems - most of which have arisen as result of change and its accompaning pressures in all phases of our lives. Business, Industry, Agriculture - transportation - you name it none have escaped the pressure of change. Yet - on a political level discussion of the Problems - no spokesman seems to dare state the true cause of difficulties represented to us as "depressed areas" - like West Virginia - caused fundamentally by change - and the cure? Who really knows.

I marvel at the avoidence in this platform of our currency situation which every Congressman and Senator must be well aware, a situation which disturbs me and vaguely alarms me - not so much by its existence - but by its existence in silence like to the Tomb - by our representatives. It has resulted not from assevere imbalance of foreign trade (goods and Services) but from a imbalance of financial transactions (tourists, investments - Troop maintaince, etc - and has been so unfavorable that while a nation cannot be judged as individual yet any individual who used as security for his own purposes the assets of others left in his care would be harshly dealt with - yet to that we are reduced! There is in this nation 20 Billions of Gold - The law of the land requires 12 Billions of Gold to support the circulating currency - 18 Billions of the Gold we hold is owned by Foreign Governments and Banks - so we are in effect supporting 5/6 of our currency using the assets not our own, but of others! With this platform offering no surcease from this drain - and in fact this year or next will if this rate of drain continues find us in the position of maintaining our currency entirely with the assets of others - and essentially unable to meet any total withdrawal of these assets in full - gives one long pause as to how long before the house of cards falls?

This talk of Economic Growth puzzles me - esp. any set rate. I see growth as a greater output of needed goods. in volume of numbers - not as many growth figures are - dollar value for far too often the Comparison of dollars hides the fact that apparent growth is truly no growth at all for the identical volume of goods was involved. In efforts to provide for adequate Growth - Walter Lippman in recent comment on growthmanship inadvertantly put a finger on one of the difficulties when he portrayed the sum standing in the way of its achievement 2.3% 12 Billions - 5% 20 Billions - increase 8 Billions - which though he did not say so is the minimum average drain on our Tax resources of our debt interest!

I see also in this platform a pledge of "freedom of information". From my personal experience a request for information has been promptly answered by Republican members of the House and Senate - and with a few notable exceptions very rarely by a Democrat - so I am amused that they propose to tear down a wall that exists in great part in their own operation.

A comparison in the Modus operandi a strictly business one - between us and the U.S.S.R. should warn us that rather than further over extending our already thin resources we should be employing American Brains, intelligence and ingenuity to overcome the handicaps under which we labor -

Russia has tight Control of her debt - do we?

Mr. K. in the same speech announcing the W2 Capture - announced a 90% devaluation of all debts public + private - (and wages, prices, money - Since She has before employed this device with success - it is far from propaganda!

at one stroke - she 1) reduced her debt -
2) devalued her industrial plant
3) Cut Wages (Controlling inflation!)
4) increased her currency reserve.

To me - this ability as against our own position holds far greater potential for our ultimate disaster since our leaders if they are aware of it (and it seems very strange that they are not - choose to remain silent an pursue a course to secure power with promises which if fulfilled will inevitably make any competition on a world basis more difficult - if indeed it does not so overstrain our already slim margin of fiscal safety beyond the point of no return!

As you made your comment I could not help thinking that - Sacrifice, austerity, and self discipline were far more in keeping with this challenge than that offered at this Convention.

America is more than adequately supplied with What Russia still has to produce - able to maintain at one and the same time a great flow of both gadgets and goods for life and pleasure - and a great war Machine - Russia must still sacrifice the first to produce the Second!

Our greatest problem is to cope with the force of change - which will ever operate as long as individuals are aggressive enough to use intelligence and iniative to do things faster and with less effort. Not till this aggressiveness ceases to be will change lose its force. It has in Agriculture alone - In the years since Government has been valiantly trying by its Farm Programs to maintain the "status quo" be responsible for over 35 millions of persons seeking other means of livelihood. While the numbers leaving in the future can never again reach that total for there are less than half that number left - still since no farm program - can halt change - and since change is still operative in agriculture that present participants will still shrink. Government can no more preserve the family farm - except that it be the unit with the lowest total production costs than it can halt the tides - or the breaking out of Earthquakes - The Political plank notwithstanding.

One thing this presentation of the Convention should bring home to every American (I wonder how many got the Message) That the Convention is not interested in Securing the best man to meet the Challenge - but the most likely to win!

Thank you for the excellent interpretive job you and your colleagues did in reporting this. I hope I have not bored you with this rather rambling discussion.

One thing more - a study of history shows -

1.) Communism was born into this world - in 1917-18 - when our affairs were in the charge of a Democratic President -

2.) It was introduced into our bosom and made respectable in the world in 1933 - again a Democratic President

3.) Central Europe - Poland, Eastern Germany with the dangerous Berlin situation - the Loss of Mainland China, North Korea, the Kurile Islands - and half of Sagakeland Island - again a Democratic President -

4.) Is it wise on the record to entrust to this group the very fate of this nation? Judging solely by the record of History! Quien Sabe - Sincerely, Barden Jones.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow: My dear Mr. Murrow: you apparently have been harboring a dislike for for Adlai Stevenson for some time. I watched the proceedings of the Convention on Ch. 2 and enjoyed the whole affair very much I that the C.B.S. men did a superb job. It was then I heard you you say he didn't, "He the nomination. I heard

Mr. Stevenson on a

He stated his reasons for

The reason referred to his 2 previous defeats.
He stated he would in regard to Mr. Stevenson

He gave the Founder's

He was misquoted in

My dear Mr. Morrow:

You want to know why Nelson Rockefeller is to walk in Albany instead of taking second spot on the Republican ticket.

First of all you realize quite well that had Rockefeller & Nixon run in any primaries as Kennedy did with democratic opponents Rockefeller, not Nixon would have won. So he deserves first place

Second he is too wise to lend his name to the destruction that Nixon will bring the country ~~to~~. Nixon is committed to Eisenhower policies & we all see where they are headed. Nixon was a fine man when elected Vice President but has then truly American anti-communist views were not compatible with Eisenhower's pink views & policies, they fought & Nixon reformed, joined Eisenhower's colony of pinks who have betrayed us thus far so that our position is almost irretrievable.

Third he is the only man who isn't pledged to and supported by Communist-controlled forces. He is not backed by labor forces controlled by international labor union which is in turn controlled by Russia. He is the only man who sees the truth of our situation and has the sense & strength to do something about it. He is our only chance.

Does that answer your qu. Tom? Johnson took second spot because the poles had given Kennedy the first. They would do the same for Rockefeller if they had the chance.

Would you be good enough to read this letter on your Sunday night broadcast

Thank you.

Dear Mr. Morrow

I have finally become organized enough since the Democratic Convention to inform you that you have lost one most avid listener and admireor. You were tops in my book on the coverage of any news event and with what I considered an unbiased and fair view-point. But after listening to you and your colleages about the draft Stevenson demonstrations and campaign, I am through. You may have the inside dope on the leaders of the drive, and have a right to be cynical about them. But as for the thousands of us who took part in the demonstrations, you have no right to say we were "paid" or not sincere.

My husband & I believe Adlai Stevenson is not only head & shoulders but waist too above any other candidate considering the serious world situation. We believe he has the best answers for a peaceful world. We are not "beatniks" or "rowdies" ~~and~~ or any of the other adjectives used in connection with the Stevenson demonstrators. My husband is an attorney, I am a homemaker and mother of two children. We devoted practically an entire week to this drive. We were at the airport & at the convention demonstrating. We wrote letters, sent telegrams made phone calls, and I might add did an awful lot of praying. We did this in an sincere and enthusiatic manner. We certainly received no payment or promise of any kind.

Mrs. Frank J. Burns, Jr.

And it was frankly nauseating to me, to watch you in the glass booth telling your millions of viewers how disgusting this base show of emotionalism was. Especially you, who have earned your living by making your news coverage so emotional. I hope we shall never reach the point where we fail to use our heart and soul in deciding which candidate is best to guide the fate of our country. If this is as accurate a coverage, as you give all your coverages, then I am not interested in wasting my time watching you.

Sincerely,
Patricia Burns

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am not of the general habit to write letters of wither protest or acclaimation as regards what I hear and see in the various news and entertainment media,but I am moved from this position by what I feel was your bad taste or judgement last night during the address of Sen. Barry Goldwater at the Republican Convention.

I am not active in political organization and have no super enthusiastic feelings towards any of the principals: I was tuned to C.B.S. only for the reason that I wanted to become INFORMED...to learn and hear...and have foundations for the development of my own thinking.

Whether you,I,or anyone ageees with the attitudes of Sen. Goldwater is not important,but none of us can honestly deny that he IS news..and that is what C.B.S. is supposed to be there to reflect. Any man who is front page headline news material on most papers on Monday morning can certainly not be said to have insignificant things to say that SAME evening! I,as a typical listener,wanted to hear directly his speech,and your choice to cut him off in favor of chit-chat with Gov. Dewey was most untimely. What Dewey had to say(his health and your golfing relationship) could have been programed more effectively at many other times:Goldwaters speech was NEWS...live!

A C.B.S. booster or stockholder might readily feel that such practices might account for their favorite network's fall to second place in in audience ratings. I,too,will at least try N.B.C. tonight to learn about President Eisenhower,"unabridged."

By RICHARD STARNES

NEW YORK, Aug. 1—There is a widespread disposition to grant that TV has done a good job in covering the recent conventions, but the fact of the matter is that TV has done an astonishingly bad job, and one that augurs poorly for the campaign to come.

This, to be sure, would be a fact of overwhelming indifference were it not for the tremendous impact that TV is having on our political and social folkways. The evolution of political conventions is bound to be speeded to a revolutionary pace by the demands of TV; the very selection of candidates is now largely in the hands of the image-makers; the whole of the forthcoming campaign will be cut to fit the cloth of the broadcasters.

Newspapers are normally dependable social critics but it seems to me that they have been unduly diffident in taking TV to task for its shortcomings in the field of news and opinion. This is very likely due to an exaggerated fear of having the bony finger of economic determinism pointed at them; that is, of being accused of knocking a competing medium out of base motives associated with profit.

DONT GET MAD OVER CRITISM - LET IT BE A MEANS OF AN AWAKENING IN YOUR WELL BEING OF THE FUTURE

Many Commentators Lack Manners

Notwithstanding the risks, however, one must comment on the shocking lack of good manners shown by TV's actor-reporters, or perhaps by the unseen directors who manipulate these people. Each network boasts various electronic snooping devices and most of these Orwellian gadgets seem to be operated by individuals selected for the towering heights of boorishness they have reached.

Times without number broadcasts of speeches were interrupted when the frantic camera eye saw a momentarily greener field in some other event, usually no more exciting than the picture of a helicopter disgorging some lesser princeling into the reluctant arms of his admirers. Bone-weary candidates and their batmen were pursued with a voracity that would have done credit to a starving hyena.

As bad as it is, this want of breeding and sensitivity is not the major flaw in television as a medium of news and opinion. Much the more disturbing factor is TV's basic misunderstanding of the role of reporter and/or interpreter. Those who umpire such matters seem agreed that NBC did a superior job to the one done by CBS in covering the conventions. This judgment, of course, is of no earthly interest to any sane person but the reasoning behind it strikes directly at the heart of the matter.

YOU ARE NOT AS INTELLIGENT AND SMART AS MANY PEOPLE THOUGHT YOU WERE

Form Takes Precedence Over Content

NBC's edge, apparently, was largely credited to the fact that Messrs. Huntley and Brinkley were more palatable to viewers than say the picture of Mr. Murrow peering at them with the self-important air of social responsibility one would expect to find only in a man operating a Flit gun in a barber college.

This would seem to be a clear case of permitting form to take precedence over content; an inversion that is uniformly pernicious in any artistic enterprise, and one that is downright dangerous when it takes command of a medium of tremendous political and social influence.

My own hope, as forlorn as it may be, would be for a TV reporter of intellect and objectivity, and what of it if his voice does sound like anthracite tumbling down a coal chute and he has the personality of a cold boiled potato to go with it?

Reporting is seldom improved by being filtered through the personality of the reporter. A good reporter traditionally is a political eunuch, icily objective and utterly indifferent to attitudes and prejudices of proven public appeal. TV has not yet produced one to these specifications.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Having followed with interest for many years your news commentaries and personal interviews and finding you mostly an impartial and perceptive observer of fact and personality, I was somewhat disappointed in your convention reporting. In particular I refer to your comparisons of humility between the presidential nominees.

First, let's take Senator Kennedy on the night of his nomination in for Angelos. Agreed, there was no noticeable humility - and had there been would it not have been a little suspect. After all, he's been campaigning for four years for the nomination. Rejoicing in the victory ~~would~~ was to be expected. However, I would not have called him unemotional. Look again at the hard swallowing during the singing of our National Anthem and at the exchange of glances with his mother. In that, I think you'll find a tremendous pride in his country pride in the honor of being his party's nominee rather than solely a competitor's joy in victory. Obviously, he believes strongly in America's need for new ideas and a Democratic administration. He thinks (I'm paraphrasing) "These times would dwarf any man but somebody has got to do the job." He is a man of ideas, ideals, and know-how, a life long student of government combining political skill with vision. Moreover, he communicates the strong feeling of the urgency for new ideas in a sincere, inspiring manner.

MRS. F. PEARSON AMES
1374 PENTWOOD ROAD
BALTIMORE 12, MARYLAND

Now let's take Mr. Nixon in his hotel room after the nomination. He, too, had sought this goal for - let's see - not four - but eight years. No smiles of greeting here. Rather, we created the impression of a reflective, thoughtful candidate, humbled, grateful - to his family, church, community, etc., giving Destiny her due. A sober, pondering, philosophical mood prevailed, interrupted by only ten minutes of "dress rehearsal" freshening up. Now you, Ed, above all, who are most at home in these pondering moods, know that this state is not one to slip in and out of abruptly - say, at a signal from a technician - without some degree of falsity. The mind works such that the practical down-to-earth, matters-to-be-attended to surface level is in control or else the deeper level, stream of continuous thought, is sort-of sunk into. But, I don't think Mr. Nixon had time to put on his diving suit and one wonders whether he really got down there at all. ~~[illegible]~~ And if facial expression and manner are any indication of sincerity and conviction, Mr. Nixon's lowered, shifting eyes might suggest that he was not thoroughly convinced of what he was saying — as though he tried to feel it but couldn't. He seems to have a certain lack of inner conviction and, perhaps, identification, trying to paste parts of personalities he admires and/or respects on to his own i.e. Ike's humility and sincerity, Kennedy's political mastery, even Krushev's tough spontaneity.

I think it's a mistake to look for humility in the glare and blaze of television cameras, anyhow. One practices humility in the daily acts of one's everyday life and does not display it flagrantly for the T.V. audience's or commentators' emotional fulfillment!

So please, Mr. Murrow, let's have your impartial and sensitive analysis of facts and personalities back. TAKE OFF THOSE BLINDERS!

Sincerely, Anne Ames

Dear Mr. Murrow —

I have long been your admirer, which fact I hope entitles me to give you a friendly word of criticism.

I have been following your convention commentaries with considerable interest, but have been disconcerted the last day or two by the feeling that they are not entirely impartial. Your observations at Los Angeles were generally somewhat cynical; in Chicago you adopt a warmer tone.

Certainly I've no fault to find with your being on cordial terms with individual Republicans (as in your cozy exchange with "Thomas E."), but the whole tenor of your remarks seems to have shifted from (1) fault-finding to (2) giving generous credit where credit is due.

Maybe you've changed to the relaxed attitude demanded by the Times' Jack Gould, or maybe two weeks ago you had indigestion.. In any case, in the coming campaign months I shall be looking for your famous reportorial depth and objectivity.

Very sincerely —

Dear. Mr. Murro.
I have watched and listened to you away out here, and your voice and comments came out very fine.
Now I think you would do a great favor to all Vets over this country, if you would comment on your programm in Chicago before the Convention closes. Why did not Dem or Republicans, say a word about the Vets, in all other conventions, the Amer Legion,

Vets of Foreign Wars, were present, Why does both parties pass by us Vets. not a mention of Vets in any platform,
Now the Vets of W.W.1 are very disgusted at both parties, the Vets W.W.1 are trying to get a Pension for all of us Vets, and the Republicans missed a chance to get many Vet votes by giving the Vets the pass by,
As you know after Spanish Amer war - 20 years later all were put on Pensions. Now it is time for Vets W.W.1 to have full Pensions, But as the Vets say, it was a shame how both parties, did not say

Dear Mr. Murrow:

For many years, I have been a first-line Murrow fan. But, sir, I am unhappy to notice that you have lost or perhaps, misplaced, your ability to see both sides in political arguments.

You probably will get letters from Democrats who feel that you have slighted their causes, but I feel constrained to complain that your partisanship is showing. It has even seemed to reduce what has been one of the most articulate of voices to one of a group—rather than its former high position. Please, sir, bring us back the Murrow that has been so helpful in forming valid, reasonable opinions.

Most sincerely,

Dear Sig:

If you are really concerned about the ratings of your news-coverage teams (viz., the 14.5 NBC vs your own 12.0 in the recent conventions) you ought to replace the naive and solemn banalities of Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite with the sparkling sagacity of Howard K. Smith and the wry wisdom of Eric Sevareid. If Smith, probably the most brilliant commentator you have, could have teamed up with Eric, you would have had two perceptive and witty men who could have coped adequately with the successful Huntley-Brinkley team.

I was especially nauseated last night when Murrow solemnly summed up the differences between Nixon and Kennedy's comments upon learning they were the nominees of their respective parties. The CBS audience was informed that Nixon showed greater humility than Kennedy after learning of the event. Since Murrow was so taken in by Nixon's nauseating persiflage about "mother, wife, children, father's advice, lack of good looks, dream of every American boy" etc. etc., and since Walter Cronkite seriously acquiesced in these observations, don't you see why they will never gain the audience that the sophisticated Huntley and Brinkley have?

I am calling some of my wiser friends who watched NBC TV last evening to see if Huntley and Brinkley commented this favorably about Nixon's humility - at Kennedy's expense.

If you bring Eric back from England and elevate Howard K. Smith to the position he rightfully deserves in your news team, I shall once again become a CBS news devotee. Until then, however, hurra for Huntley and Brinkley.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr Murrow :-

Just as the Convention closed you remarked that in choosing Henry Cabot Lodge the Republican Party might lose out in the Middle West. Dear Mr Murrow we like to live too. They say the push buttons for every airfield (U S) in the World is in a Central Intelligence right down here in Omaha - about 150 miles as the crow flies from our corn fields. So here's one Republican Middle Western.

Who is happy to have Mr Lodge - he seems to know the Russians - I do hope the Nixon - Lodge ticket is as good as I think it is.

Thank you - I guess we all feel that we know you - even to writing & telling you straight - Sincerely

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As we were watching the two political conventions and then the commentary and analysis by Mr. Walter Cronkite, ~~two~~ Howard K. Smith you and others I had a feeling of regret and emptiness. Every little happenning was analized, things to come predicted with such accuracy that there were no surprises and not much left for our own thinking and digesting, everything is given packaged and ready to eat and digest, no stimulus for a little independent thinking and coming to conclusions.

I know a little help from experts is essential, but am I wrong in feeling that we are depending too much on the experts?

Please forgive me for taking the liberty to write, women feel more and think less, and that's the way I feel.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I just turned off my TV after watching the two conventions practically from beginning to end, which at times became something of a strain. I would like to tell you that I enjoyed watching you (as well as the other CBS men) perform your difficult task, a task of keeping up interest, of pulling together details, and giving meanings, in a situation where angels must fear to tread. I enjoyed your crack about Stevenson the "secret drinker" (although it hurt a bit). I enjoyed your comment last night about Nixon's informal acceptance speech as showing that his famous '52 speech was no accident (although you backtracked rather quickly).

However, you probably have come to expect criticism from your fan mail, and here it is. The massive TV operation seems to become its own victim, through the pressure to fill the time by producing "scoops" where there are none, or by grasping for minor points and blowing them up out of proportion where perspective is missing. Two examples: 1. You brought out discerningly, but repeated too often, Kennedy's "lack of awe". I wonder whether Nixon took the cue for his extended display of awe last night from your comments? 2. You jumped on the large dose of promises in the Democratic platform, emphasizing always "without any increase in taxes" (although , if memory serves me right, even the platform did say something about the source of the money and something about increases in times of crisis). You disregarded, on the one hand, the fact that Kennedy certainly had a lot to say about sacrifices. You neglected to point out, on the other hand, that Nixon, after first disavowing an "out-promising" strategy, made practically the same promises as the Democrats without indicating at all where the money was going to come from, except of course for the standard phrases about individual initiative and a much weaker appeal for sacrifice. It seems to me that the important function you perform should be one of breaking up stereotypes rather than building them up or reinforcing them by selective overemphasis.

Also, I was a bit disappointed tonight, that you did not point out how essentially similar in content the Republican acceptance speeches were to the Democratic statements (certainly Lodge's speech was Un-Republican; if you delete a couple of references, it could have been delivered at L.A.; so was the major part of Nixon's).

I told my class just the other day that I thought one of the most important parts to listen to in such programs is the winding up, the analysis, or better the attempt at analysis. Watchers too easily get lost in the multitude of words and events, either getting bored or captivated by details fitting into the "pictures in their heads", without understanding what really is happening. Here is where you come in: with your job of providing some perspective, some order and analysis, since you are in the best position to reach the people. (They certainly will not get this from their respective parties.) It would be too bad if this chance to provide some badly needed understanding were lost because you fall in love with your own bon mots.

Keep at it.

Sincerely yours

Fred Schulze

Dear Mr. Murrow -

Cabot Lodge may, as you said, alienate the Midwest on the Republican ticket -

But I am from the Middlewest - and he doesn't alienate me. Nor my mother. Nor my husband. Nor the 9 Republican neighbors on my city block. We talked about it several months ago. I suppose you'd call us middle-class Americans, and thinking Americans. We've watched Lodge on TV - as much as TV will allow us - and we don't mind if he isn't a back-slapper - a loud and jolly politician. We know that isn't the type of vice-president we need. We're satisfied with Lodge and certainly have faith in him. I hope you understand that we're not all farmers in the Midwest - if that's what you meant. And one thing more - you at CBS might like to know that our family - like hundreds of others - rented a TV set for this occasion while on vacation at Clear Lake, Iowa. Many many cottages around the lake were tuned to CBS till late at night. How encouraging to have the viewer's thinking upgraded by programs of this nature! Television tends to underestimate the intelligence of the viewer - and I hope others will write to say how much we appreciate the chance to see and hear significant TV.

From Los Angeles, Mr. Murrow,

...hardly was Senator Kennedy done with his acceptance speech when Walter Cronkite jumped on his "immodesty" (like a duck on a Junie-bug he jumped) in saying "I will be worthy..."

Last night from Chicago you reminded us of this point.

Far be it from me to pick a fight with such well seasoned grammarians as you two (and I haven't checked with Bergen Evans); but was he not saying (with appropriate modesty) "It is my will to be worthy"...or..."I shall try to be worthy"? Isn't that the literal translation of "I will" in this context?...as opposed, say, to Gen. MacArthur's "I shall..."

Politically, I couldn't care less. (I've never yet voted for a Democrat president and, the way things seem to shape up, may never.) Grammatically, though, I'm concerned... 'cause the language'll go on no matter who wins.

Congratulations on the excellent job you and the CBS team are doing on convention coverage.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I should think a mere sense of common decency and fair play would have persuaded you to ask to be relieved of even attending the Republican Convention.

I believe no one in this nation, you know, so utterly despises all Republicans as you do. You looked positively ill as the President was speaking.

I am a dedicated Republican but watched every session of the Democratic Convention. Why? I am an American first -

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It is only simple justice, and not flattery, to tell you how very much our whole family has enjoyed yours and Mr. Cronkite's reporting of both the Democratic and Republican National Conventions.

My 75-year old mother, my husband, my high school sophomore son and I have discussed the masterful way in which you brought all phases and every facet of each convention into our living room. We had the awesome feeling that we were seeing history in the making, and the cozy feeling that we were "rubbing elbows" with the principal characters themselves. The various roving reporters helped, also, taking us into ante rooms, hotels, and onto the convention floor to participate in the various activities.

Thank you so very much for these many hours of enjoyment, which has been an educational experience, as well.

Dear Sir:

I was dismayed by Edward R. Murrow's unjust criticisms of President Eisenhower's fine speech to the Republican Convention. Where your other commentators gave a just and rational evaluation of this talk, Mr. Murrow proved once again that he cannot give a fair and unbiased accounting of Republican affairs.

May I suggest that you henceforth limit Mr. Murrow's coverage of political events to Democratic functions as his interests obviously lie with this group.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

As one of the captive audience of KTBC-TV (the LBJ station for this area) I have observed and listened to most (though not all) of the convention coverage provided by the CBS network for both the Democratic and Republican conventions. I can understand that coverage of and comment upon such affairs are not easy matters, and I also acknowledge that my reactions to your coverage are colored by strong Democratic preferences. It is also conceivable that your comments and reactions may have been better (by my standards) than those provided by NBC and ABC, although judgments from other sources suggest that this was not the case.

Acknowledging these rather imperfect bases for judgment, I still feel impelled to write you of my disappointment in the contributions you made to the telecasting of the Republican affair just concluded. Surely if you had any function to perform as a commentator on these meetings it would have been that of spreading just a little bit of the acid of informed comment on the speeches and other elements of the proceedings. My memory is that you did something of the sort for the Democratic gathering, and it was certainly appropriate for you to do so. My Democratic bias does not completely blind me to the inanities (both among the participants and their ideas) that were in evidence at Los Angeles.

But surely the Democrats had no monopoly on "pie-in-the-sky" promises, half-truths, unfounded charges, and convention "rigging." Nor could you be expected, as you pointed out, to correct all errors of fact or interpretation, but your interpretations of what Republicans did say were strange indeed. Consider the Goldwater speech, the theme of which came in the comment that Democrats are "dedicated to the destruction of this country." Consider the interview with Nixon on the night of his nomination. Consider the set of promises and other glittering generalities offered by Nixon in his acceptance speech.

And what was your reaction to such items, with or without Walter Cronkite's help? The Goldwater speech was a real challenge from the conservative element, clearing the air, and strengthening party unity. The Nixon interview showed the man's "humility." [How long do you suppose he had been rehearsing this speech, or at least preparing its general approach and content? How in the world could you measure humility in these self-serving comments?] The Nixon acceptance speech showed that this would be a vigorous, hard-fought campaign--but no comment on the arsenal of weapons he was already employing, the equally generous promises with no bill to be paid since all these wonderful things would flow, presumably costlessly, from free enterprise made ever freer.

Then there was the Cronkite comment, in which you at least tacitly concurred, of approval of the fact that there had been no reference to Kennedy's religion during the convention. Just how naive can one be? Who by any stretch of the imagination would have thought a mention of Catholicism before a nation-wide TV audience could have in any sense been advantageous? If the Republicans are going to exploit the fact, they will certainly do it under different circumstances. I fail to see anything remarkable about this abstinence from open comment. [For the record, let me say that I have no Catholic affiliation whatever; if my religion has any denominational brand at all, it is that of East Texas Baptist.]

Please understand, Mr. Murrow, that I write more in disappointment and mystification than in anger. Perhaps you were tired, or bored; one could understand such a reaction, as these proceedings were monumentally dull (particularly in the Republican case). The second week may have been just too much for you. And I know that you did make a reference to "diplomatic disasters" under the Eisenhower Administration. Probably this statement will have brought down upon you the wrath of the (adult) bobby-sox contingent who put this idol in office. [By the way, my applause for the brave fellow of CBS who pointed out that Eisenhower set a new low for mistakes by making only six.]

But, in all seriousness, Mr. Murrow, surely you can provide your audience with more informed comment than you gave during the Republican convention. I have on many occasions admired the work you have done on radio and television. I understand that you are most gravely concerned about the effects of public policies which we now follow. If this concern is at all well founded, as I believe that it is, then there must be some special obligation on people in your position to say something intelligent (no doubt, irritating) about the men and the ideas competing for national attention and approval.

I understand that Westinghouse will present several programs during the campaign; perhaps you are booked to be on these or others. If you are, don't spare Kennedy and the Democrats, but please take off at least one glove when Richard Nixon's turn comes. Otherwise, in my judgment it would be just as well for you to go away somewhere and brood, leaving the commentary to be handled by the Furness family.

To the President:

Dear Sir:

It is with an intense sense of wrath and outraged indignation as I voice my disapproval with all the vehemence and force at my command, caused by the smug conceited attitude of complete disrespect as expressed by your "Walter Kronkite" for Mr. Edward R. Murrow at the last final minute of the close of both the Democratic and Republican Conventions, where he "blanked-out" this fine and noble gentleman from us - we, the buying public.

Never in my entire life have I ever seen the equal of such a dirty raw deal as perpetrated by your "man" Walter Kronkite" upon the person of Mr. Edward R. Murrow as was done last evening in his low exhibition of discourtesy and shameful disrespect, which can only accounted for by his "stuffed-~~up~~ shirt attitude" of egotistical self-importance as he snubbed Mr. Edward R. Murrow; while he as a perfect Cad, allowed three (3) of his T.V. associates to bid farewell to the public, he denied that self-same act of courtesy to Mr. Edward R. Murrow!

We, in our household are not happy and are very much displeased as a result of this most adverse uncouth "low-brow" insulting experience as "dished-out" to us - the buying public by your Representive of the House of Westinghouse - your "man" Walter Kronkite. He tilted his hand and by doing so he revealed the type and kind of a person that he actually is - "a square peg in a round hole" to the entire discredit of your otherwise meritorious highly ethical harmonious program - up until the last moment he had to throw a monkey-wrench into the works.

And, it is indeed trusted that we the buying public - your customers will see no more of this Cad "Walter Krokite" by being given the opportunity to try and be-little the noble stature of such a fine gentleman as Mr. Edward R. Murrow?

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been an admirer of you and your reporting through the days of the second world war when your voice would come over the air "THIS IS LONDON", and through the days since, when you were heard "THIS IS THE NEWS".

Last evening after Mr. Nixon's speech when you and Mr. Cronkite briefly discussed it, I received the impression of cynicism in your remarks. I sincerely hope that in your long experience of analyzing people and events you have not become cynical, and that you have not acquired the belief that no man can be genuinely inspired and completely honest. We should, of course, have the true facts whenever possible, but I do not believe this means that we should doubt the motives of every man, and particularly one who spoke as convincingly and as inspiringly as Mr. Nixon did last night. This country, I am sure you will agree, sorely needs real inspiration, particularly in these times, in the direction of the "American dream", so often talked about.

I believe most people who heard Mr. Nixon last night received the impression that he may well be the man of the hour; the one to start and lead throughout the world, a counter ideology of freedom against communism. In any event, why discount the possibility of world freedom, and belittle Mr. Nixon's declaration that we, America, under his leadership should attempt to accomplish just that. I am sure you will agree that the only way to counteract a wrong ideology is with a right one. Should we not all back the man who showed the vision, the sincerity and the indication of intelligent leadership we saw last night?

The excellence of your commentaries has put you in a high position in this country's thinking, as you, of course, know, and I humbly suggest that you carefully consider the influence of your comments in this time of grave crisis and try to give enthusiastic support to any honest and competent effort to win the ideological contest we face.

Very sincerely yours,

Attn: Mr. Edward R. Murrow

Mr. Murrow:

At the conclusion of the conventions it is sad to say that a top news analyst closeted in the fanciest booth for seeing and hearing all that went on gave little news to his T.V. audience while he appeared to be both biased and bored. Yes, Mr. Murrow, you certainly had that appearance in L.A. and Chicago. With much repetition you acclaimed the grandeur and superiority of the Republicans at their nominating convention. How could it be news when a decision for the nominee had been made in December? And weren't the votes really counted at Los Angeles?

In the dealing with personalities, we tire of the gloved glamour pictured by the Republican females. The Roosevelts who seconded the nomination showed certain physical resemblances to their forefathers. The teeth of Teddy, the voice and smile of Franklin D. But the porcine appearance of John was no inheritance. Frankly, the penguins plunging in their pool at our local Zoo give better performances. Did you know there are thousands of children more alert and full of imagination who could portray our beautiful young Americans than those elite ones on the big Show? Remember that the best ingredients make poor dishes even when garnished with the finest fixings, served on silver trays, if they have been made unpalatable from over-cooking.

Observations were made of minor incidents. At Chicago a banner bearer whose sign read, "A nomination not a coronation" stood out. At L.A. a photographer collided with Kennedy in a dark corridor at the Coliseum while seeking the picture of the very man he almost knocked down. Vice-Pres. Richard N. Nixon in his acceptance speech reversed the charges of derision by offering his better America.

And finally the personal, Being a descendent of pioneers who came west in covered wagons, I shall always be touched by their spirit. Being a veteran, a Democrat who is no pal of Krushchev I hope to continue being a loyal American — not because of Nixon. You Republicans have assumed that most Americans are chameleons who change to please your political fancy.

Appreciation of the opening daily ceremonies at the Chicago convention comes from one who taught over thirty years in the public schools in Berkeley, California. Such formalities have the psychological effect of ~~of~~ putting one's attention on the business of the day.

I hope during the coming campaign the C.B.S. reporters will tell for every time they repeat the paternal Kennedy's fascist views, also ~~support~~ that the Lodge isolationism ~~which~~ defeated the U.S. efforts to become a member of the League of Nations.

My opinion of the excellent reporting of Walter Kronkite, Alex Hendrick and Howard K. Smith are not changed.

Good golfing with Thomas E. Dewey,

Dear Mr. Murrow,

After watching both the Democratic and Republican conventions covered by you and Mr. Cronkite I was disturbed by one thing. The very noticeable lack of analysis of Mr. Nixon's speech. I felt that it was an excellent speech and should have been recognized as such. Considering the fact that you reach so many homes and that people are naturally impressed by what you have to say, as I might add, the lack of it, I feel that it is only right that you should be more neutral in your coverage. You went to great length over Mr. Kennedy's speech (which incidentally I stayed up to watch) and I was eagerly awaiting your analysis of Mr. Nixon's speech. None was forth coming. I can only hope that in the future when you cover events of this type you will be more bi-partisan.

Sincerely,
Mrs. A. D. Ageilby

Sir;

I thankyou for your comments during the convention that have just concluded.

I cannot agree that N.B.C. won honors for their T.V. coverage. In my humble opinion you are still the king of them all, and your age and experience add prestige to what you do and say.

Thankyou

Dear Mr. Murrow & staff, I'm not in the habit of writing fan letters, but when a job is well done, I feel we should give credit where credit is due. After shopping around from one station to another on my T.V. the first day of the Democratic convention I finaly settled down to channel 2 K.N.X. for I was tired of listening to the private opinion of commentators, What I wanted was to hear what was going on down on the platform and on the floor, and you and Mr. Cronkite certainly gave it to us, Maybe I'm a wee bit prejudiced Mr. Murrow for we listened to you night after night during the war, with your "This is London," and when you came back to the states on a lecture tour we went to hear you at the South Pasadena high school, and down through the years your Radio and T.V. programs have been tops, Thanks again to you and your staff for helping me to enjoy both conventions, It truly made me feel that I too was there.

Dear Sir:

We wish to express our resentment of the abominable performance of your Edward R. Murrow in the CBS TV coverage of both national political conventions.

It is our understanding that the networks are obligated in the public interest to give an objective, impartial presentation of the news. The TV audience has a right to expect this. The obviously partisan Mr. Murrow is an affront to the trust, confidence, and intelligence of your audience.

We commend Walter Cronkite and Howard K. Smith for their excellent observations and analyses. They are fair, sympathetic, and balanced. To be sympathetic merely means to present the events, personalities and ideas without rancor. Mr. Murrow failed disgracefully to fulfill his obligation in this respect in the Democratic Convention.

Surely a man with such a marked antipathy should not be forced - nor permitted - to undertake such an assignment!

For a commentator to deliberately distort and pervert his function in order to present his own partial, partisan beliefs is a performance totally intolerable to us, the audience, and we would assume, also to you, the President of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Were it not for our great admiration and respect for Walter Cronkite and Howard K. Smith, we would confine ourselves exclusively to NBC news.

Sincerely,

Mr. & Mrs. Glenn E. Boyer

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Immediately following his speech at the close of the Republican Convention, you misquoted Mr. Nixon as having said, in answer to Krushchev's threat, that Russian grandchildren would be living "under freedom". This is very different from "in freedom" which is what was stated by Mr. Nixon. I believe that it was this change of prepositions to which the convention audience responded so thoroughly and enthusiastically, not the change of nouns.

Dear Ed Murrow; Although I have a wooden-ear I heard the historic faux pas of Rocky as he presented Richard "E" Nixon, and anxiously awaited your comment at The end of the program. But you let me down. I cannot believe that such "sharpies" as you and Walter did not catch it. Doubtless you are familiar with Freud's interpretation of such "slips of the tongue" occurrences.

Dear Sir,

I enjoyed your coverage of the Democratic and Republican National Convention. Edward R. Murrow was outstanding in his analysis and comparison of the candidates and their platform. I was especially pleased to note Mr. Murrow was given more time to talk during the Republican convention, rather than being interrupted so much during the Democratic part. I'm looking forward to hearing more of Mr. Marrow in the future.

Dear Mr. Morrow:

Am sending you the enclosed card, not because you need the advice, far from it, but because after looking at it for years it has not done me a particle of good - I just never learn and have to be shushed every time there are more than two people around. You probably saw this in some card shop and mentioned the gist of it on your convention broadcast - so for any future use you may have to mention the advice - here's how.

I want to express my great admiration to you and Mr. Cronkite for the fine work you did on both conventions - I was almost more interested in your comments, but you both apparently had "brain well in gear" because I couldn't tell when you approved or did not, and I would like to know which side you were on - only by instinct could I feel you were for Nixon, and that plays tricks on me too.

Anyway - your poker faces were fair to both sides and in the face of all that oratory that was a tribute to your skill in reporting.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Murrow,

For years I have been one of your countless, profound admirers. Perhaps, you can imagine, then, my deep shock at your stunning lack of perception about Richard Nixon, the night he won the Republican nomination for President.

As I watched the interview with Nixon in his hotel room, after he learned he had won the nomination, I was struck so forcibly by his complete insincerity. All his protestations of unworthiness was such a hoax. All his humility was pure "ham." I could see the wheels turning in his shrewd brain: "Kennedy's humility wasn't apparent, I'll have to lay it on thick." And, boy, did he!

Your comparison of Kennedy's lack of humility and Nixon's great modesty was unfair because you were measuring surface appearance, and, also, because there was no private interview with Kennedy as with Nixon. Kennedy was talking to the convention. Did you feel humility in Nixon in his acceptance speech, when he was saying over and over with such great assurance, "I will do this and this?"

I'm sure Kennedy felt he couldn't show any false modesty when his opponents have kept hammering away of his youth and lack of experience.

What hurt me about your comparison of the two men, was the reminder of King Lear and his judgment of Cordelia, who didn't drip words of love and his other two daughters who did.

I only hope that, like Lear, you will come to see the light, and see the hypocracy and opportunism of Nixon versus the true honesty of Kennedy.

Sincerely yours,
Carl S. Kindquist

P.S. I must add that your whole performance during the two conventions was very disappointing to me because of your evident partisanship throughout (as an example, your handling of Stevenson.)

BACKGROUND

SUNDAY, July 31, 1960
12:05 - 12:30 P.M.

MURROW: This is Ed Murrow. The name of the program is BACKGROUND. The conventions are over; some political eagles have turned into butterflies and there're some wounds that must be healed. But the delegates have gone home and the politicking in earnest begins. Both candidates are running against Khrushchev. I have with me here in the studio two of my colleagues, Blair Clark and Alexander Kendrick who've been covering the conventions with me these last three weeks.

Gentlemen, let's start by taking a quick look at the two platforms and then at the two candidates. And since both parties seem to be primarily interested in foreign policies, let's look at the two foreign policy planks first. It seems to me that the Democrats support the Atlantic community, propose a broader partnership which goes beyond our common fears and welcome the progress made towards European unity. The Republicans call for regional groupings in emerging areas to work out plans for economic and educational development. Not very much difference between the two there.

The Democrats say that they will not permit the establishment in the Western hemisphere of a regime dominated by international atheistic communism. The Republicans support President Eisenhower's reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine in all its vitality. Again, I think you would agree not very much change. In the Middle East also substantial agreement - urging the Israelis and the Arabs to get together and try to solve their difficulties. Both platforms promise to prevent further encroachment of communism in the Western hemisphere. Both platforms call for suspension of nuclear tests with adequate safeguards. Both favor continuance of foreign aid but the Democrats ask for a certain shift of emphasis, from military assistance. They say that they would like to replace tanks with tractors, bombers with bulldozers, tacticians with technicians.

The Democrats and the Republicans oppose Red China's admission to the United Nations, but the Democrats would welcome any evidence that the Chinese Communist government is genuinely prepared to create a new relationship. The Republicans say flatly that recognition of Communist China is firmly opposed.

Would you think that it's a fair summary of the foreign policy plank in the platform?

KENDRICK: I think it's a summary of the foreign policy plank and I must add this comment that, as we all know, platforms are, as you say, documents of promise - they are statements, really, of principle - and I think the more interesting aspect of the foreign policy question, in the Republican Convention at least, was not the platform so much as it was Mr. Nixon's acceptance speech in which he proposed what he would do to implement this platform, this foreign policy plank - I think that's the most interesting thing.

To get back to your reference, Ed, to the Democrats... Democratic intention to switch from the military to the non-military aspects of foreign relationships, Nixon did the same thing. He spelled out what seems to me to be a policy of massive retaliation, so to speak, in the non-military areas.

MURROW: What he really suggested was that he would like to get all of the non-military operations abroad in one fist, in one organization - and all three of us have spent a certain amount of time wandering about the world and I think would agree that our foreign organizations are bloated, duplicated, and confused. Too many people doing too many different things without sufficient coordination.

CLARK: In his news conference yesterday, Nixon, in effect, said that he was going to make Lodge the high command of this new economic effort. Don't you think this amounts to an amendment to the platform? As Alex said, it's always a question how much platforms mean - but to me it seems a quite radical departure from the Republican platform. This is a brand new idea not in the platform.

KENDRICK: Well, I'm not so sure that it isn't ... the germs of it are not contained in the Republican platform. I mean, after all, the language of platforms is so vague anyway that you can take it anyway you like. But what seemed to me most interesting in Nixon's spelling out of this first step that he proposed to take was this, that he kept stressing the need for victory over communism by non-military means and I would say that the more he stressed it the more he was implying that the Eisenhower Administration hadn't really done too well at it, you see, and I thought this was a sort of cutting away from the Administration even though in other aspects of his speech he had high praise for the Administration. I think he's now resolved to go ahead and do what Eisenhower couldn't do or didn't do.

CLARK: Is it irreverent to question the price tag on this new move, all the protestations about economy -

KENDRICK: Well, he says we're going to do all this and yet save money. Now, that'll be an interesting thing, you know, if it happens that way. Of course ... (inter.)

CLARK: It's rather hard to visualize.

MURROW: Well, it seemed to me that the Republicans were saying, in essence, anyone who says that we have lost ground, that we have staggered from one disaster to another in the international field, is almost giving aid and comfort to the enemy. And then he went on to say but still we have to do a few more things than we have been doing.

KENDRICK: I was frankly disturbed by this theme all throughout the Republican proceedings. They kept speaking about people who had been denigrating America; this was their constant theme. And now there is one aspect of it, namely, I got the feeling that some of the Republican leaders think that all you have to do to make a thing so is to say that it's so. But beyond that, some of the references made by even the topmost leaders seemed to me to stem directly from the most conservative wing of the Republican party, because when Goldwater and his boys were holding forth they were attacking the Democrats really as people who desire the downfall and the end and collapse of America. It seemed to me they were going a bit to the extreme, you know.

MURROW: But, Alex, it is also true that in Los Angeles, the Democrats made, I think, more sweeping promises than have ever been made before in a platform. They were not only going to deal with Khrushchev in the world field of international affairs, but they were going to improve education, health, the farm, everything else, and they were going to do all this by a very simple device of causing the economy to grow at a rate of 5% a year, and this could be done simply by voting Democratic, and there would be no increase in taxes.

KENDRICK: Well, that was oversimplification. But then on the other hand, the Republicans, or at least the Goldwater wing, took this to mean that the Democrats were plotting the destruction of America. I don't see that that follows.

MURROW: Well, let's look at the farm plank of the two parties for a moment and see if we find much difference there. The Democrats say they will work to bring about full parity; they will take positive action, and then they list the measure such as loans on basic commodities and not less than 90% of parity, production and marketing quotas, food stamp program for the needy, and they of course repudiated the Republican administration of soil bank program and they pledge an orderly land retirement and conservation program.

The Republicans, on the other hand, omit all mention of parity, and they say that specific promises of specific levels of price supports are a cruel deception. They call for an intensified food-for-peace program and they say they will cooperate with the food surplus nations to assist the hungry people. The Republicans call for a large-scale land conservation reserve program. There is at least one point where the two parties agree, they would both create a food reserve for national defense purposes. Here again, Alex, it seems to me that the Democrats have out-promised the Republicans.

CLARK: I don't think there's any question, Ed, that even though there's no mention even indirectly of Mr. Benson, the Secretary of Agriculture, that Nixon has done everything he possibly could to reject Bensonism and everything that Benson stands for. It's not ... it's hard to spell that out in platform language but he was conspicuous, Benson was conspicuous by his absence at the meeting in Chicago on Saturday.

KENDRICK: I don't know too much about the farm aspects of the platform but it seems to me that the Republicans took a calculated risk by nominating Lodge as their Vice Presidential man in the face of this midwestern sentiment for somebody who understood what the farmer wanted, and I would think that Lodge would have some difficulties. A man named Henry Cabot Lodge isn't going to make much appeal in Iowa I shouldn't think, unless of course, you know we have Jack running and Dick is running. Unless we start calling Lodge Hank (laughter), he may not do so well out there. But perish the thought, I don't think anybody has ever called him Hank, really.

CLARK: Doesn't sound like a dirt farmer's name.

MURROW: Well, already, I think some of the Republicans are saying that Kennedy is a window box farmer.

But let's look now at the two party platforms on economic growth. The Democratic platform says our economy can, and must, grow at an average rate of 5% annually. The Republicans say that our economy is now prosperous but we can, and must, quicken the pace of economic growth to meet new demands, and the mainspring of vigorous economic growth lies in the private sector of the economy. Here certainly, is one area of basic disagreement between the two parties on the domestic scene.

CLARK: Ed, I think that what lies back of that is a basic Democratic acceptance all through the ranks of the party, except in the extremely conservative wing, that any major efforts that are going to be made on a national scale assume a kind of collective effort, collective may be a bad word and one that isn't generally used in politics in America, but it assumes that in any major thing you cannot wait for the private sector of the economy to take the necessary steps whether it's in defense or any new domestic program. Whereas the Republicans, in their doctrine at least, have not accepted this idea even though in practice they carry it out a good deal.

KENDRICK: Well, I think also that there may be a little bit of propaganda in this, in these two attitudes. I don't think the Republicans really differ basically, at a certain minimum level anyway, about the role of the Federal Government in state and local questions. Now, the farm situation is one of those. I don't think the Republicans are in favor of giving up subsidies to the farmer and yet these Federal aids and I wouldn't exactly call them private enterprise. If they really believed in private enterprise, if both parties, well, if the Republicans who say they do, believed in it, they would remove all subsidies of all kinds.

MURROW: Well, this is one of the basic areas of disagreement though. The Democrats ... (inter)

KENDRICK: So far as the platform is concerned ...

MURROW: In political shorthand, the Democrats believing in big government, government intervention or guidance in the whole area of economic development, the Republicans contending at least that they would provide a greater area of uncoerced choice for the individual.

Let's look at the civil rights platform for a moment. The Democratic platform calls for compliance, at least first-step compliance, of the Supreme Court school desegration decision by 1953. The Republicans promise the full use of the power resources in leadership of the Federal government to eliminate discrimination in voting, employment, schools and housing and they also say that all public facilities must be available without regard to race, color, religion or national origin. The Democrats promise to support whatever action is necessary to eliminate literacy tests and the payment of poll taxes as requirements for voting. Basically here I should say that the Republicans perhaps promised a little stronger and more vigorous action in the field of civil rights. Would you think that accurate?

KENDRICK: I would think so but haven't they always done so? I think it was more revolutionary, really, for the Democrats who try to keep a solid South, to put up a strong civil rights plank than it was for the Republicans. After all, they've been talking about Lincoln at every session of their convention. This was a hundred years since Lincoln was nominated and he was the one who started the whole civil rights question so to speak - I would expect the Republicans to be stronger than the Democrats about it.

CLARK: And as the cynics say, the Republicans rely on the Southern wing of the Democratic party not to put into execution the words that're in the platform. At least that's been the legislative history (inter.)

KENDRICK: But, Blair, doesn't this also indicate that perhaps the Republicans have given up the idea of taking the South?

CLARK: I think they have. If we're going to move into the political scene, Ed, at this point I think that they ... my own view is that they flirted with the idea of trying to get some Southern states until Lyndon Johnson was nominated on the Democratic ticket, and then rather rapidly they shifted their ground. And I think this is an interesting point and does not do very much to reinforce the idea that American political parties are much on doctrine. They adapt themselves with great expediency to tactical situations such as the one that came up when Johnson was nominated.

MURROW: Isn't this a great gamble the Republicans have taken, one, to put all the emphasis on foreign policy, two, to nominate Lodge, because if the international MURROW: Well, now both of you gentlemen have had a chance to measure these two young men who are the candidates of their party, if they meet in public face-to-face debate, which is likely to turn out the winner?

CLARK: With large groups of people, in my judgment, Nixon will be more effective. Kennedy seems to believe in a more abstract, dry, if you want, aristocratic, approach to government and the issues, whereas Nixon has shown a couple of times ever since the nomination that he will pull out all the emotional stops and talk about his own origins and mother and hearth and so on and very effectively show that he is a representative of a group in society which is larger than the one that Mr. Kennedy comes from.

KENDRICK: I'm not sure there's that much difference anymore, Blair. Here you have the traditional party of the poor, the Democrats, with a rich man as their nominee, you have the traditional party of the rich, the Republicans, with a poor man as their nominee. I would think it then resolves itself into a matter of personalities and, frankly, I don't find much to choose between the two. I think they are typical products of this new and young American generation; they have a certain amount of institutionalism in them if I can call it that. I think both of them are basically conservative in spite of anything that their platforms may say. And they may simply propose to fight it out on a question of which one can do the same thing better than the other - that's all.

MURROW: There was a time, at both conventions, when it seemed that they were arguing about who could go forth on a white charger and joust with Khrushchev and had the best chance of coming out best.

But, gentlemen, we've been talking about the importance of foreign policy in this campaign, and it seems to me that about a week ago Americans woke up to the menace of Chinese Communist infiltration of Latin America, because Red China signed situation continues to deteriorate can Nixon and Lodge disassociate themselves from those policies?

CLARK: I was going to say, Ed, that seems to bring in the question of Eisenhower and Eisenhower's mantle, in my opinion, is going to be very difficult to transfer to Mr. Nixon even reinforced by Lodge.

MURROW: Well, if the President campaigns very considerably in the course of the next few months, it seems to me it must be a rather defensive effort on his part.

KENDRICK: Well, exactly. He has already made this speech at the convention in which he defended his Administration. He's certainly likely to go on doing that. But can Nixon go on defending Eisenhower's Administration or will he even try to? That's I think the most interesting question in this campaign ahead.

MURROW: Well, he's certainly indicated in Chicago that everything was fine in the garden but a few additional things required to be done. Particularly in the area of defense spending and as you said earlier, Blair, the coordination of our non-military activities overseas.

CLARK: Ed, on your point about the gamble that Nixon is taking. What if things go very well, what if all the crises on the horizon suddenly disappear and things are going just fine and foreign policy is not an issue in November. I doubt very much that that would happen but it might ... the tension might have let down considerably (inter.)

KENDRICK: The Russians might be that canny, hm?

CLARK: Then where would the Republicans ... (inter.)

KENDRICK: Yes, there's another risk they're taking, I mean (inter.) operates from both sides (inter.)

CLARK: The most interesting political thing is Nixon's quote which has not been refuted that he's supposed to have made day-before-yesterday in a meeting of the Republican leaders in Chicago when he said "We're licked, in effect, if the Democrats campaign ... if we allow the Democrats to campaign on domestic issues, it's got to be on foreign policy".

an agreement to buy 500,000 tone of sugar from Cuba every year for five years. Chinese Communists have been visiting Cuba. But in the past year, more than 60 delegations from Latin America have visited Red China. Guy Searls, our colleague, has been studying the background of this problem and here's his report fron Hong Kong. Let's listen to it.

SEARLS: Red China is pushing in to both Africa and Latin America with what it considers its most important export product, that is revolutionary technique. This does not mean necessarily that the Chinese Communists are calling for the traditional form of revolution, the mere replacing of one government with another. What they want is a revolution in orientation. An existing government is just as good as a new one for the time being at least if it is willing or able to reorient its policies for those of the so-called Socialist camp. The prime requirement in any case is a complete rejection of anything American.

The Red China thrust into Africa and Latin America has been going on for some time. Its effects, which are just beginning to be felt, will probably grow stronger. At least that is what the Chinese Communists plan. This was shown very strongly by the Peking reaction to their success in Cuba, where they signed their first government level trade pact with a Latin American nation. Instead of hailing the new trade pact as a victory, Red China described it as merely an opening wedge for the rest of Latin America. The Peking government is boasting that Latin America, which formerly was the backyard of the United States, is now the front line in the battle against United States imperialism.

Red China began its penetration into Latin America in what has become the classic Communist style. First, there was sympathetic propaganda for Latin American problems. Then in 1956, a Chinese opera troupe toured South America, spreading the Peking line and making political contacts along with the dancing and singing. The opera troupe was followed by other visiting cultural groups from Communist China. And soon afterwards, a rash of delegations from Latin America were making pilgrimages to Peking. All of them are being propagandized with the evils of so-called American imperialism. All of them are being urged to break all ties with the United States in favor of closer relations with the Communist camp. (indistinct) of aid and favorable trade arrangements, such as that signed with Cuba, are being offered. And, incidentally, the Cuban trade agreement is not economically sound from the Communist Chinese point of view. But it gives the Reds what they more urgently want, a long-term political foothold in Cuba.

Now, back to Edward R. Murrow in New York.

MURROW: Well, Alex Kendrick and Blair Clark, we also have a report from Marvin Kalb in Moscow - and the quality of the signal was not quite usable so I'll read it:

He said "Yesterday was Congo Day in Russia, a new holiday proclaimed just a few weeks ago, to highlight Moscow's carefully circumscribed concern for the young African Republic. Protest meetings sparkled the propaganda landscape, warning the imperialists could have plunged into Katanga and absorbed this extraordinary natural wealth with total impunity. Now, though, they have to answer to Russia, a selfless, disinterested, generous friend of all unstable and underdeveloped nations. "After all," Moscow asks in a boastful tone, 'who is helping the Congo? - the imperialists? No. They want only profits, confusion and chaos. The Soviet Union is helping the Congo.' And Kalb goes on to quote the Russians as saying already four planeloads of condensed milk and sugar have arrived in Leopoldville and a few shiploads are on their way too. "This," Moscow concludes, "is generosity without parallel", never once mentioning that the United States has already shipped more than several hundred tons of food into the Congo. No matter, this was the theme of Congo Day in Russia and the holiday itself was symbolic of Moscow's entire attitude - it fell on a Saturday, a free day for many Russians and thus insured a larger audience for radio and television propaganda shows. These shows, reports Kalb, have two main aims:

First, to convince the Russian people that the Soviet Union has always been a sincere friend of Africa. These propaganda shows have another major purpose, to discredit the United States. This has been a special aim ever since the U-2 and the Paris failure.

Soviet propaganda has scornfully insulted President Eisenhower, threatened America's allies, and has warned about its overseas bases. Now, Soviet propaganda has added another notch. Whether the story tallies with reality doesn't seem to matter. The United States encouraged Belgium to suppress and loot the Congo so it could extract huge profits for itself. This twin theme - that is, Russia's generosity and America's imperialism - has swarmed through Soviet propaganda for the past two weeks. But with all the verbiage and threats and warnings, there hasn't been a single military commitment, and this is the key to Soviet behavior in the Congo. For the Russians do not want a war over Katanga and there is some doubt that they could sustain a military operation in the heart of Africa. As they're proud of admitting, they have no overseas bases, thus no means of sustaining an offensive outside the Eurasian land mass. In the meantime though, there'll be lots of yelping at us but no biting. Could all this somehow be tied in with American political campaign?,- Kalb asks. "It's possible but unlikely," he concludes. "The same motivations would have encouraged the Russians to adopt the same belligerent pose even if this were not an election year. Besides, Moscow is not really inspired by either Nixon or Kennedy. The Republican nominee has known for some time that he's left them cold. The Democratic nominee, they don't know very much about, but they don't trust him."

So the Russians tend to lump Nixon and Kennedy together, as the pawns of powerful monopolists who sit in smoky rooms deciding the fate of the American people for the next four years.

Well, that's the interpretation, gentlemen, of the conventions as seen from Moscow.

Thank you very much, Blair Clark and Alex Kendrick. This is Ed Murrow. We'll be back again at this time next week.

Gentlemen:

I read with interest the article in this morning's issue of your paper by Mr. Warren Rogers, Jr. (special to the Inquirer, dateline Washington July 31). My attention was first attracted by the headline on the story: "Nixon Aiming to Show He's A 'Regular Guy'". I was interested by several statements in the article as follows:

1. ". . . determined to prove to the voters he is a regular guy with no love for fancy things like steak and champagne."

2. With regard to the Vice President's attendance at the 11 A.M. church service, rather than the 9:30 A.M. service, Mr. Rogers quoted Mr. Nixon as saying: "I was so sleepy I couldn't get out of bed."

3. "Some of Nixon's advisers have been concerned about their man's personal appeal, that mysterious 'it' which President Eisenhower has in abundance. Franklin Delano Roosevelt had it and many think Senator Kennedy has it too. But Thomas E. Dewey's lack of it is generally conceded to have figured heavily in his 1948 loss to President Harry S. Truman."

4. "Nixon is proud of his humble origin."

5. "One night after a steak dinner, the Vice President told reporters and live television cameras, 'I really prefer hamburgers, I really do.'"

6. "Another time at a victory celebration with the Calif. delegation, he said, 'I don't like champagne, not even California champagne.'"

7. "After selecting Lodge, the Boston blue-blood, as his Vice Presidential candidate, Nixon commented, 'I never thought that I would ever be running on the same ticket with a Lodge.'"

8. "That is the substance of his campaign - the meat and potatoes, with the 'regular-guy' image simply the sauce to make it all go down more smoothly."

Mr. Rogers' type of objectivity is, of course, not new to your newspaper. For example, on July 27 you carried on your front page an Associated Press release from Convention Hall in Chicago, reporting that Senator Dirksen drank a glass of pre-inspected water which had been placed on the rostrum for President Eisenhower. The article went on to say, "Curiously, even though Dirksen was praising the President, had he had his way, Mr. Eisenhower wouldn't have been here at all. Dirksen fought for the nomination of Robert A. Taft for president eight years ago in this hall."

COPY

Another example of objectivity released by the Associated Press, is an item by Mr. Saul Pett which was printed in the Lebanon Daily News July 30: "In his home town, Whittier, Calif., a citizens group killed a move to name a street after the vice president. At his alma mater, Whittier College, where he was to deliver the commencement address, several seniors protested. A separate receiving line had to be created for those (it turned out to be two) students who preferred not to shake Nixon's hand." Although this incident apparently took place in 1954, Mr. Pett sees fit to bring it out at this time, now that the two opposing Presidential candidates are known.

We have heard it said that a picture is worth a thousand words, and I was very much interested in a picture appearing in the Lebanon Daily News Saturday, July 30, bearing the credit line, UPI-Daily NEWS Facsimile. The UPI went back to 1928 for this picture, showing a youthful Richard Nixon complete with shock of hair and a rather pale hand, clasping a violin. While realizing that this photograph may have been obtained from a member of the Nixon family, or possibly from the Vice President himself, it was interesting to me that it was considered appropriate to bring out in a Presidential campaign that promises to be one of the most hard-fought in history. Apparently, by way of an offsetting effect, an accompanying picture shows him in the uniform of a U.S. Naval Lt. (jg) taken in 1942. If there were any interest in showing the man in the service of his country, would it not have been perhaps more appropriate to have shown a shot of him and Mrs. Nixon, completely surrounded by an openly hostile mob threatening their very lives by stoning in Caracas, Venezuela in 1958? Naturally, we would not look for such a picture in a controlled or undiscerning press.

I am also reminded of Mr. Edward R. Murrow's performance on television at the Republican Convention in Chicago last Thursday evening, in which he referred to Mr. Nixon's reputation as a poker player during his military service days. The only thing that I know about Jack Kennedy's performance in military service is that he practically won the war single-handedly by his outstanding personal heroism in PT boats. The only thing I know of Mr. Nixon's performance in military service is what I learned from Mr. Murrow's reference the other evening, and that was Mr. Nixon's reputation as a poker player. I don't know what game you boys are up to, but it is very evident that Mr. Nixon is in quite unfriendly hands from the press reports and commentating that I have thus far observed.

Although I am not a strong Nixon man, I do wish to enter a plea for greater objectivity. While your shananigans might well win the election for Kennedy, I would like you to know there was one observer who found your contrivances quite transparent.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Having witnessed Mr. David Brinkley's performance on television at the Republican Convention in Chicago on Tuesday evening, I looked in on your presentation at the final session of the Republican Convention last evening, Thursday.

I noted your reference to Mr. Nixon's reputation as a poker player during his military service days, when you were talking about the big gamble he is allegedly taking in making the Russian situation the big issue in the coming campaign.

I also noted your description of Mr. Lodge, who apparently reminded you of an impeccably tailored diplomat of the British Foreign Service, as he stepped off the plane in Chicago. You seemed to feel that this picture of Mr. Lodge would hardly endear him to midwestern voters. Is it possible that this description of him might also be expected to alienate him from voters in other parts of the country?

Disinterested televiewers who make such observations as the above are naturally prepared to be told that we are seeing things under the bed, but we would nevertheless like to enter a plea for greater objectivity during the coming campaign. When you say to Mr. Cronkite that it is sometimes difficult to remain completely objective in these things, we understand, but in a matter as important as a Presidential election, we feel that you should make a special effort.

By the way, aren't you afraid of getting lung cancer? I have never seen any one smoke so many cigarettes.

Very respectfully yours,

Dear Mr. Brinkley,

Not being a particular TV fan, I have not had much opportunity to see you on television, and consequently had no real preconceived ideas about you prior to Tuesday evening's session of the Republican Convention in Chicago. I was particularly struck by your singular lack of objectivity; in fact, I finally started jotting down some of your remarks. Since I was writing in longhand, the quotations are probably not exact, but I feel that I have captured the spirit of your remarks.

I noted your comments with regard to Mr. Charles H. Percy, Chairman of the Platform Committee, who is generally recognized, I believe, as an extremely able business executive, and a dedicated man in rendering service to others. I was interested in your comment, "I am told, not by Mr. Percy, but by some of his friends that he wants some day to be President of the United States."

I was, therefore, not entirely surprised when you made the comment to Mr. Huntley, "I'll bet you 10 cents that Rockefeller will neither nominate nor second Nixon's nomination." Nor was I surprised, as the suspense was building up for the President's departure from his hotel to undertake the trip to Convention Hall, when you reported that a demonstration of about 3 or 400 people was developing for Kennedy outside the Convention Hall, including a large lighted sign stating Kennedy Is The Remedy. It was interesting to me that, as the camera followed the President's progress from his hotel to the Convention Hall, there was no indication of such a demonstration, nor were there any Kennedy signs in evidence that I was able to see.

When Representative Charles Halleck was introduced as the permanent Chairman of the Convention, I was quite prepared for your comment that he had once been given an inscription by President Eisenhower "describing him as a political genius and signed D.D.E." Nor was I surprised when you added, "He practically has a key to the White House."

As Senate Minority Leader Dirksen was about to introduce the President, I was not at all surprised when I heard you say something to the effect that "When he talks, the words come out like little rubber balloons of helium."

Nor was I surprised to hear you slip in the remark that the Republicans had found it necessary to rebuild the podium three times. As Mr. Huntley described to the TV audience the small toy elephant bearing the inscription Feed Me and Mail Me, which the Republican party is mailing out to its supporters, I would like you to know that I caught your comment: "That is for Republicans."

During the enthusiastic and prolonged demonstration for President Eisenhower, we in the television audience noted that the President turned to Senator Morton and said something which you reported to be as follows: "You better use this (indicating the gavel) or this will never stop." I was wondering how you were able to pick up this quotation in the uproar.

You will recall that, after the President's speech, Mrs. Peter Gibson was about to go to the podium to make a presentation on behalf of Republican Women to Mrs. Eisenhower. The gift was beautifully wrapped and as Mrs. Gibson was about to go forward you announced, "Mrs. Eisenhower will now be presented with a bracelet." I attached no significance to the remark other than the fact that you seem to take pleasure in being something of a spoilsport.

I was also interested in your comment that President Eisenhower intends to devote the remainder of his term simply to keeping the radicals from making a raid on the public treasury. I personally believe that he intends to do more than this.

I thought about you as I read on the front page of the Philadelphia Inquirer this morning an Associated Press release from Convention Hall in Chicago, reporting that Senator Dirksen drank a glass of "pre-inspected water" which had been placed on the rostrum for President Eisenhower. The article went on to say, "Curiously, even though Dirksen was praising the President, had he had his way, Mr. Eisenhower wouldn't have been here at all. Dirksen fought for the nomination of Robert A. Taft for president eight years ago in this hall." There is no indication as to who prepared this release, but I couldn't help wondering to myself if you didn't deserve a credit line.

When a nation is made up of people who are no longer freedom-loving, but simply interested in talking about freedom, the subtlety of spoon feeding becomes a rather specialized art. I must congratulate you as a man now recognized as a master in your trade.

Most respectfully yours,

WILLIAM H. WORRILOW, JR.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

During the two recent political conventions I watched with great interest the C.B.S.'s telecast. I was especially interested in the comments made by you and the others on the happenings.

I remember at the close of the Republican convention the remark that the religious question had not come up during the convention; never-the-less I don't think that you thought that question had been settled when Mr. Kennedy swept it under the rug in his nominating speech.

Supposedly, the issue in this campaign is the to be the big one on foreign relations. So far I haven't heard that issue mentioned by those who have already said who they will or will not vote for.

Before I tell you what they based their decisions on I want to explain that they were not morons. Some of them are college graduates.

about 98% of the opinions I've heard so far is that they will not vote for Kennedy because of his religion and his wife. Most of these opinions are from Democrats.

Remember a man is judged by his choices. They feel that they cannot "see" Jacqueline Kennedy as the first lady. a man's religion, factually, is largely geography and geneology but ideally he is free to choose his religion.

I find that people feel that the Secretary of State is the man that counts in the field of foreign affairs.

I'm sure that platform or television opinions will not mention these questions but "person to person" they seem to figure in. The voting booth will be more akin to the person to person.

Sincerely.

Dear Mr. Murrow,-

I have enjoyed your T.V. programs immensely, for which I thank you. However, I have a complaint. I have tried to forget it as "one of those things" but it has continued to plague me ever since.

At the Republican Convention you made the remark that Mr. Nixon had told you that the speech that Mr. Judd was about to make was in his opinion the greatest that any convention ever heard. Then Mr. Judd made the keynote speech; the most slovenly, inaccurate, stupid speech I ever heard. A nonentity gets up and claims credit for the Republicans that they had brought about the increase in population and employment (not a word about unemployment). It is the first I had heard that the Republican Party invented marriage and sexual intercourse.

I am sorry that I have to disagree.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I'm sending you an editorial published in yesterday's Charlotte News which puts you in very distinguished company. Many of your listners share the News's evaluation of your work.

You asked your viewers (and yourself, I suspect) during the Democratic convention what it was about Adlai Stevenson that drew to him such loyal supporters. I have been thinking about that ever since. I believe that a majority of thinking people my age (28) and a great many others, too, feel we must involve ourselves in the problems of our country and the world yet we hesitate to join with a group of people who homologizes into a mere blob of protoplasm. I think one can be a follower of the Stevenson political philospphy without losing one's identity. The fact that he lost two elections did not make him change his mind or his public statements; why should it change the minds or statements of those who sincerely believed in him and his program? That he had his moment of opportunity against an Eisenhower was as ironic a twist as any classic dramatist could have conceived of, I believe. His final story will not be a tragedy, however, if Kennedy is elected. If given the opportunity he should help the country evolve a foreign policy that will make him immortal.

Sincerely,

Joanne Montague

Let Us Now Praise Famous Men

If distinguished service awards for performances "beyond the call of duty" are good for the military services, why not for civilians, too?

So thinks New York Sen. Jacob Javits, who has introduced a bill in Congress authorizing the president to give 20 medals a year for civilian achievements "which deserve national recognition." Each medal would be accompanied by a tax exempt cash grant up to $10,000. In order to avoid political implications, the recipients of the awards would be selected on the basis of recommendations from a special board of 15 members.

Just imagine yourself a member of that recommending board and make up your own list of nominees. Who are your personal heroes on the contemporary scene in the U.S.?

Faulkner: Prize and Praise?

In literature, would you suggest Robert Frost the poet and William Faulkner the novelist? In science, Robert Oppenheimer of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton or Dr. Jonas Salk of the polio vaccine? Or perhaps some yet unknown hero who will make an important future discovery in the control of cancer or heart disease?

How about Dr. Frank Laubach, whose literacy work around the world has taught millions of people to read? Or Ralph Bunche, who has taken the mediating role of the United Nations to the strife-torn Congo?

Or Norman Cousins, who through his books and his forceful editorials in the Saturday Review has repeatedly warned this nation of the dangers of nuclear war? Or Eleanor Roosevelt, who has worked unceasingly for a world of peace and justice and human dignity?

Or Sen. Margaret Chase Smith, who back in the ugly days of McCarthy smears spoke up in the U. S. Senate with her eloquent "Statement of Conscience"?

Or Commentator Edward R. Murrow, who through the years has been a welcome voice of reason and enlightenment as he discussed the news of each passing day? Or the Rev. Martin Luther King, who has led the Negro race along paths of peace instead of violence?

Or Adlai Stevenson, who added a new dimension to political discussion and who has been often right if never President?

We Americans are free enough in our praise of famous men and women. A presidential Medal for Civilian Achievement, plus the cash award that would enable the recipient to continue his distinguished service and encourage others to emulate him, would convert the praise into a more tangible reward.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

As I have been an admirer of yours since the beginning of your radio career, particularly your notable war broadcasts, I wish to tell you how very much my family and I enjoyed your part in the CBS coverage of both conventions.

Your thorough knowledge of American political history made it possible for you to interpret the proceedings so that they were more meaningful to every one.

We were particularly impressed with your drawing attention to the difference in humility shown by the two candidates. We feel that a man faced with the prospects of being elected to the highest office in America should be humble rather than arrogant.

On the lighter side, your quip about the "secret drinker" was most amusing!

We are looking forward with much pleasure to your coverage of the coming campaign.

Dear Sir:

Will you please accept for consideration an expression by reporting & reporters at political conventions.

Because the conventions have one objective, which is to finally elect their candidates which were more or less selected in advance of the conventions, and since any other objective on general or specific issues is too thickly covered with sentiment for recognition, it appears that reporters at these conventions should be of a 'light weight' type, talking little nothings while selling refrigerators, etc.

Many of us think too highly of your abilities to enjoy your presence on this kind of a job where logic and sincere consideration of objectives is displaced by ambitions.

I sat in the home of a friend in Battle Creek and we then felt ~~that~~ as we watched your coverage of the Kennedy deal that you were too intelligent for the job at hand. In Northampton, Massachusetts, ~~we~~ a group of us watched the initial phases of the Nixon deal, and I did not think you fitted there any better. At home, last night, my wife & I came again to the same conclusion.

Of course, none of this is any of my business, but if you respect the thinking of a man, you hate to see that man in the wrong dimensions.

You have become a sort of truth beacon for many of us. We know that we can be vaporized or radiologically killed at any time. The convention spokesmen have told us nothing new. We know that two forms of society are waging war on most levels for control of posterity. We are for survival, obviously, and are for more than adequate defense, and most of all, we favor intelligent statesmanship. We don't always sit down to big dinners without remembering that 2/3rd of the world's people are hungry, and we remember that one of your friends, Eric Sevareid, referred to the Bordeaux phenomenon, wherein you may know a fact without feeling it too deeply — in this case, the hunger around the world. But we do want things done about it.

This looks like a crank letter, and indeed, if I were not so busy trying to make a living in an independent business, I'd probably be a crank letter writer.

Well, we like you in spite of your unused talents in the convention.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I've forgotten his name, but your man who on Monday night of the Convention draped himself around the Vice President's neck in the effort to interview him in the crowd should be given something else to do.

I am not a great admirer of Mr. Nixon, but I think an official of his stature is entitled to a little more respect when he's 'on camera', don't you? I didn't think your suggestion that Nixon 'almost lost his temper' was justified.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It is not necessary to tell you about the biased broadcasting of the Republican Convention since that was no doubt according to orders from headquarters, but this is to let you know it was very apparent.

I realize it is futile to make any protest or criticism of such actions for the reason that, basically, men worship two gods:

1. Themselves.
2. Money.

May I suggest, therefore, that a former idea be re-activated, namely, the formation of two clubs as follows:

1. Murrow is not God.
2. Rockefeller is not God.

My dear Mr. Morrow:

Not in sorrow or anger but in considerable amazement, I heard your program this morning.

In Senator Kennedy's acceptance speech the one thing that impressed me the most was the following quotation:

"But the New Frontier of which I speak is not a set of promises – it is a set of challenges. It sums up not what I intend to offer to the American people, but what I intend to ask of them. It appeals to their pride, it appeals to our pride, not our security – it holds out the promise of more sacrifice instead of more security."

Unless I misunderstood what you said you were complaining that neither candidate had made this clear.

Yours from the department of utter confusion,

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It is amusing to hear you pick key words from Senator Kennedy's acceptance speech, and use them as your own. Not only this, but to hear you use his words against the Senator, e.g., the word "sacrifice."

Do you feel, perhaps, that your listeners are illiterate, or perhaps that they are short on memory. Do you think your listeners cannot read you?

You heard the Senator's speech. We also hear his speech, and know that he was the first to use the word "sacrifice," when he said words to the effect: "I am not going to promise the American people anything; I am going to ask them to sacrifice .... "

Shame! Please try to be original in your thinking.

Mr. Morrow + Mr Cronkite do not work well together. Because you, Mr. Morrow are an analyst

1) For one thing, Mr. Murrow, since you are an analyst, you should have a desk of your own or at least be on camera alone or with another analyst such as Eric Sevareid who I understand is in England at this time.

You should not be on camera with Walter Cronkite. He, like John Daly of ABC, is a fluent speaker, a gift not necessarily tied in with his knowledge. Mr. Daly never discusses with Lawrence Howe but lets him talk & analyze. An analyst & an anchor man do not work well in informal discussion on camera.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I had the misfortune to be listening to CBS during the broadcasting of the Democratic Convention. I have tried to forget your attack on a great and self-effacing statesman, but feel that perhaps you should know that I and millions of other Americans cannot forget.

I have heard many loathsome things and snide attacks over radio and television, but I do want you to know that you have the "honor" of reaching a new low in reporting. What we heard from you, given with the air of a man telling a smutty joke, were a few mumbled words with only the phrases "Adlai Stevenson" and "secret drinker" coming out clearly. This is the smear attack, usually reserved for the lower type of politician to use.

Were you so personally involved with the outcome of the Kennedy steamroller that this was the finest contribution you could make for it? For shame — to smear the name of a brilliant, sincere, loyal man!

For this, and for this only, millions of people will remember you when your time in the sun is over. It's strange what small slips reveal the whole of a man's heart. Such tactics from a man of your presumed intelligence and standing are very disillusioning and discouraging.

Although you try to project yourself as a god in television, your crown is badly tarnished by such mean and petty libel.

I want you to know there is such a thing as loyalty in our country, and underhanded attacks will never destroy our admiration for a great man, Mr. Adlai Stevenson.

SEVAREID AND SCHOENBRUN RETURNING HOME FOR COVERAGE OF ELECTION THAT "INVOLVES THE ENTIRE WORLD"

To cover a Presidential election that may have more global significance than any other in American history, CBS News is adding two of its top foreign correspondents to its domestic election team.

Eric Sevareid, from London, and David Schoenbrun, from Paris, will come to the United States to join their colleagues when CBS News takes the air Tuesday, Nov. 8 at 9:00 PM, EST, on the CBS Television Network to report the 1960 elections. The CBS News coverage will continue through the night until the outcome of the major contests is determined.

Explaining the decision to add the two foreign correspondents to its domestic staff covering the election, Sam Zelman, CBS News Assistant Director of News for Television, said: "This election, more than any other in history, involves the entire world. The globe is continuing to shrink and, more than ever, what affects the United States affects the world."

Schoenbrun will arrive in New York City on Tuesday, Nov. 1, and return to Paris on Thursday, Nov. 10; Sevareid will arrive on Sunday, Nov. 6, and depart for London on Friday, Nov. 11.

(More)

Sevareid, for many years Chief Washington Correspondent for CBS News, will join Edward R. Murrow in a running analysis of the returns and their significance for the future of the nation and the world. Murrow and Sevareid, a familiar team on CBS News election coverage, will be seen at least once during each half hour of "Election Night, 1960." After the result of the Presidential balloting is known, Schoenbrun will join anchor man Walter Cronkite, Murrow, Sevareid and CBS News Washington Correspondent Howard K. Smith in a discussion of the significance of the voters' decisions.

Harriman 'Happy' Over Murrow

ALBANY, Mar. 13.—Gov. Harriman said today in a press conference that he was "quite happy" to see the name of Edward R. Murrow, radio and television commentator, mentioned as a possible Democratic candidate for United States Senator but in the next sentence reported that Mr. Murrow "didn't show any interest" in making the race.

Last Monday Mr. Murrow's name was mentioned as a possible Democratic candidate acceptable to the Liberal party by Alex Rose, a vice-chairman of the Liberal splinter party. Today the Governor said that the "idea" of Mr. Murrow running came from Samuel I. Rosenman, an idea man for leading Democrats from the late President Roosevelt onward to Gov. Harriman.

"It would be an interesting thing," Gov. Harriman said, with Mr. Murrow on the Democratic-Liberal ticket. Mr. Harriman said that the Columbia Broadcasting executive was an "old friend" going back to the days of the German air assault n England.

Mr. Harriman made no outight indorsement of Mr. Murow, who has indicated that he ould not make a move for the omination. At the same time, Mr. Murrow told reporters that he would not turn it down either.

Having finally produced the book I'm taking the liberty of asking Funk & Wagnalls to send you an advance copy. It's titled "Truth Is Our Weapon" and will be out June 15. I think you will be particularly interested in Chapter 7, "The Voice of McCarthy"; Chapter 8, "The Electro-magnetic War"; Chapter 10, "The Problem of Words"; and Chapter 24, "Lessons Learned."

Let me not deceive you into thinking a mention of the book would be altogether resented. Far more important, however, how about some time plugging on your own this simple theme (which is spelled out in the latter part of the book): We have now had our jamboree in the field of international propaganda. It's high time now for the Congress to set up a responsible joint committee to work with the Administration in this extraordinarily intricate field with a view to carrying out an intelligent Campaign of Truth, with a minimum of fanfare and boisterous squabbling.

A FAIR CHANCE FOR THE VOICE--AND THE NATION

By Edward W. Barrett

(The writer of the following has been a top psychological warfare executive in Eisenhower's AFHQ, Overseas Director of OWI, editorial director of a national magazine, and Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs from 1950 to early 1952.)

Americans, with their deep sense of fair play, would insist on fairness to a current underdog--the Voice of America--if they knew the full story. They owe it to themselves and to the nation to take the issue out of the circus ring and have it handled fairly, decently, constructively, and responsibly. The stakes are high.

The Voice still has important shortcomings. I know. It was the largest and most intricate of a dozen operations for which I had the responsibility throughout 1950 and 1951. I devoted long hours to trying to help improve it. We made some progress. In the eyes of a distinguished watchdog committee set up by Congress, it was "greatly improved" and "efficiently administered." Today, the Kremlin fears the Voice, answering it with increasing frequency and devoting 1,000-odd transmitters and an estimated 10,000 men to trying to drown it out. No one who has read the 1,000-odd letters a day coming into the Voice from abroad can question its value and its greater potential.

However, the Voice still has perhaps 10 or 15 per cent of the faults ascribed to it in the current television jamboree staged by a United States Senator. The fact that it is no worse will emerge if affirmative testimony is ever heard. There are many reports that the affirmative may not get public hearing. That is the reason for this plea.

As the President has said, we cannot hope to win the cold war unless we win the minds of men. Any one who has read the increasingly frequent bleats of the Soviet press answering the Voice of America knows that the Voice operation is, of necessity, a key weapon in the cold war. Whatever its faults, it has been laboriously developed and has trained a substantial crew in the intricate business of international broadcasting. Such a weapon cannot be constructed or reconstructed overnight; skilled personnel cannot be developed on short notice. If America is to have the most efficient possible psychological operation, it had better not, in a wave of misguided hysteria, destroy the foundation on which it is to build.

The constructive course is hardly that of a daily televised procession of handpicked witnesses consisting almost entirely of disgruntled persons who have been fired, demoted or passed over--the kind of malcontents to be found in any large organization. It is hardly that of giving nationally publicized hearings to one ex-employee charging willful waste in locating transmitters while keeping the door closed to an array of well-known engineers waiting to testify to the contrary. The constructive course is hardly that of staging a national television hearing for a discharged young woman to go through thrice-rehearsed slander of veteran public servants while those individuals get either no chance or a very belated chance to defend themselves publicly. And one might even question the wisdom of parading the alleged inner workings of America's propaganda mechanism before cameras while Soviet and satellite embassy staffs sit before their TV screens taking notes.

In the nation's interest, the whole business should be taken out of the carnival tent and subjected to intensive but fair and impartial investigation under a chairman who has a reputation for being more interested in making progress than in making headlines. The job could be done by President Eisenhower's capable new Commission on Psychological Strategy. In Congress, it could best be done by a permanent Joint Congressional Committee on International Information--a truly bipartisan committee such as has often been recommended, most recently by the U. S. Advisory Commission on International Information. International persuasion is inordinately complex business, requiring long, patient study. Its effectiveness is not to be glibly judged by the number of times the world "anti-Communist" is used in scripts; nor is a broadcast necessarily bad because a responsible editor changes that word to "democratic" in a particular context. It's not as simple as that.

Friends have urged me not to "get mixed up in this mess," not to answer inquiries about it. They said that, by so doing, I would only subject myself to concerted attacks and distortions by the inquisitor and his journalistic satellites. Thus far I have heeded their advice. I have hoped that Senators Mundt, Symington, and Jackson would force the current hearings into channels of objective inquiry. They have been unable to do so. Unfortunately, current officials of the Voice have been instructed to keep silent, to say nothing unless the inquiry unexpectedly offers a hearing to the other side of the story. So some one who knows the complex field of international persuasion has to speak up. As one who devoted six years, in war and in peace, to the work ~~and who persuaded decent men to join the Voice at a great sacrifice,~~ I feel obliged to do so.

Anticipating jibes that will come: I am no Leftist. Nor am I a Rightist. I am a political independent who feels much more strongly about curbing the Soviet menace than about the political welfare of either party.

It is essential to strengthen, not weaken, the Voice of America. I know most of the Voice's flaws. They result chiefly from four causes: (1) Persistent inability to recruit enough first-rate executives and engineers because of fear of being slandered and because of low pay.

(Doing at least twice as much broadcasting as NBC, the Voice has less than 1/100th as many well-paid jobs as NBC.) (2) The ~~enormous~~ complexities~~mx~~ and ~~personnel~~ frictions that inevitably exist in any organization which is broadcasting daily in ~~22~~ 46 languages. (3) The governmental regulations and red tape, essential and non-essential, that impede ~~xxxxxxx~~ recruiting, personnel administration, and contracting. (4) The fact that Voice officials have always been forced to spend more time combatting irresponsible charges of non-existent faults than they could give to the correction of real faults.

Like any large organization, the Voice also has internecine differences, some healthy and some unfortunate, and has its share of those malcontents who alibi their own failures with dire tales about others. An inquiry devoted solely to the lurid testimony of the disgruntled would make any agency or private business seem disgraceful. Omnipresent investigators indicating that they are interested solely in the derogatory would soon wreck morale.

The Voice may have other faults. Despite extreme precautions, it might even conceivably be penetrated by a subversive or two, since the Kremlin obviously fears it. ~~Ruhhxxx~~ But there is a right way and a wrong way to look for such things.

A responsible investigation like that urged above ~~should~~ could well concern itself with basic issues. It should investigate:

(1) Whether there are clear ways to improve the effectiveness of Voice broadcasts--and whether the present extensive evaluation techniques can be improved.

(2) Whether the location of new transmitters, originally reviewed and approved by large numbers of distinguished scientists and engineers, are sound; whether they are debatable; or whether they are "sabotage" as one ex-employee charged in flamboyantly publicized testimony.

(3) Whether the long-existing system of requiring a full FBI investigation of every Voice employee, the most drastic precautions existing in any normal agency, is enough to insure loyalty and security.

(4) Whether the current investigators are right in their apparent belief that effective broadcasts to communist audiences must be persistently and stridently denounce all communists--or whether it is childish to antagonize at the outset those one seeks to win over.

(5) Whether the State Department was justified last week in rushing out, under the Senator's prodding, an order forbidding quotation of "Communists, fellow travelers, etc., under any circumstances." A cardinal principle of propaganda, until the Senator took over, was that it was effective to quote the opposition against itself, to quote Stalin against Stalin, and to quote a Henry Wallace's anti-Soviet blast after he had been lionized by Soviet propaganda.

(6) Whether there has been mismanagement of radio facilities, as charged by one ex-employee. The last time such a charge was made in Congress, in 1951, I asked the chairman of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters to have an inquiry made. A distinguished committee did so, praised the program, made constructive suggestions, and reported "no significant evidence of mismanagement."

(7) Whether there are ways to protect public servants in the Voice from nationwide slander by any discharged person who wants to testify, with immunity (and so far without rebuttal) before such a hearing.

(8) Whether malcontents testimony is to be valued above the generally (but not unqualifiedly) favorable findings resulting from a five-month study by a previous group of trained investigators from the House of Representatives, the conclusions of a distinguished panel from the radio industry, and the findings, during five years of painstaking study, by the U. S. Advisory Commission on Information consisting of the head of the Yale Institute of Human Relations, the chairman of the General Electric Company, the editor of the Saturday Evening Post, the chairman of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters, and the former president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

If I am getting "mixed up in a mess," I am sorry. Some one has to say it.

PERSONAL

Dear Ed:

You know, I'm sure, that I would not willingly or casually cause you any additional difficulty or embarrassment. I still feel the rather brief and sketchy piece I did on the Voice of America was sound, but I can always say with Winston Churchill that not even I have always been right. Anyway, that's where it is, and according to every impartial report I can get, you and your staff are doing an excellent job.

The thing that concerns me at the moment, sitting up here in my log house on vacation, is this new psychological warfare board. I know Gordon Gray very well, but I cannot believe that this is not a job that requires more than part time.

I shall probably be going abroad somewhere during August, but as soon as I get back I shall be coming to Washington and maybe you will take time to give me the benefit of your judgement on this whole business. Meanwhile, permit me to offer you my best salute as being one of the few people in our profession who has chosen to serve his government at considerable sacrifice and who is doing it damned well.

Dear Ed:

Thanks for your letter of June 6 and what was contained therein. It had some very quotable material for the Bradley book. However, since you have asked me to tell you what would be most useful I have put together a quotation which might serve as a base and you could work on it from there. If you think it is all right as stated you might just have your girl phone me an okay. It reads as follows:

A SOLDIER'S STORY reveals the long-awaited inside story of war in the field as only the "GI's General" knows it. Here are the momentous decisions that made history, and the true story of how they were made. In this book the soldiers and commanders who fought the war come vividly to life -- their struggles, their personal bravery, their victories. Bradley deals bluntly with mistakes as well as triumphs, and tells everything in rich detail. Through the pages of his book march the great names of our era - Marshall, Eisenhower, Alexander, Collins, Montgomery, and all the rest - and Bradley treats each both as a man and as a leader of men. Here is the impartial truth about the war, told with honesty and fearlessness by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It's a five-star book in every respect; it should be read by every American -- soldier or civilian. Highly readable, jammed with colorful sidelights, seasoned with humor and salty speech, A SOLDIER'S STORY is unquestionably the best book written by any military leader of the last war.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

June 8, 1951

Dear Ed:

Although I didn't hear your broadcast last night, I have seen a report of it. I would like to add a little information for your own background.

On the minor side, let me say that the little broadcast you mentioned was used only by the Polish, Hungarian, Yugoslavian, Italian and Korean desks. It didn't say that there were serious Russian peace moves but added up to allegations that the Russians were trying to spread confusion by promoting peace rumors.

On the more basic side, the whole question of where an information service should be located is by no means a black and white situation. There are a whale of a lot of intricate problems to be weighed and weighed carefully. On balance, I am inclined to feel that it should be as closely tied in with policy formulation as is possible. Under the setup we now have, I participate in top policy formulation sessions, and Joe Phillips and other members of this staff participate in many other sessions at the levels from which policy is actually developed. This has been tremendously important in getting psychological considerations taken into account at the time policy is being made--rather than at the time already-made policy is being announced. I can give you a lot of examples of this.

As an indication of the really serious consideration that has been given to this problem, I suggest you look at the marked sections of the two reports that are enclosed.

(off the record: I might also point out that the Brookings Institution, after a long study, has recommended that, on balance, the information service should be located in the Department.) On the other hand, Paul Hoffman and several other individuals believe it should be an independent agency.

I would

FROM THE

CHAIRMAN, UNITED STATES ADVISORY COMMISSION ON EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE

TRANSMITTING

THE FIFTH SEMIANNUAL REPORT OF THE UNITED STATES ADVISORY COMMISSION ON EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE FOR THE PERIOD JULY 1, 1950, THROUGH DECEMBER 31, 1950, PURSUANT TO SECTION 603 OF PUBLIC LAW 402, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

APRIL 6, 1951.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed nation of the content of the presentation made to other peoples, as contrasted with the objectives sought, has only just begun. Part of the approach used at one time—the emphasis upon the strength and industrial wealth of the United States for example—ran grave risks of creating envy and resentment, rather than attitudes of cooperation and friendship. We believe that more attention should be given to the development of basic themes for program guidance. Yet it would be very unrealistic to insist that everything must be accomplished at once, and we are unanimous in reporting to the Congress that steady progress has been made over this 3-year period in this indispensable but relatively new undertaking. We urge for it increased attention and constructive criticism by the Congress and the public, and further financial support.

The preceding statement is not intended as a full and detailed report on the Department of State's educational exchange program. It is not the duty of this Commission to provide such information. Rather, it is a statement of the situation as the members of the Commission see it—a résumé of considerations which have led us to believe that the educational exchange program is sound in character and is making an indispensable contribution to United States foreign policy.

The Commission has also studied certain specific problems during the period covered by this report. These problems and the Commission's recommendations are set forth in the following section.

II. Other Recommendations and Activities of the Commission on Educational Exchange

(July 1–December 31, 1950)

A. DEPARTMENT OF STATE VERSUS INDEPENDENT AGENCY CONTROL

During the period covered by this report, there have been various proposals to remove the information and educational exchange program from the Department of State. This Commission's review of the proposals has been made solely from the standpoint of whether or not such action would make for more effective operation of the educational exchange program.

This Commission believes, one member dissenting, that the educational exchange program should remain in the Department of State and we are so advising the Secretary of State.

Our position is based on three major considerations:

First, we believe that if the program is to be responsive to the needs of United States foreign policy, it must be closely integrated with the Department of State offices which formulate such policy.

In the second place, the Department of State's over-all educational exchange program is a composite of many programs whose procedures and policies have been closely integrated so as to give the total effort common objectives. The Smith-Mundt educational exchange program under Public Law 402 is but one part of this over-all educational exchange program. Others are—

The Fulbright exchange program (Public Law 584, 79th Cong.).

The program for educational exchanges with Finland (Public Law 265, 81st Cong.).

China area aid (Public Laws 327 and 535, 81st Cong.).

Iranian-American trust fund (Public Law 861, 81st Cong.).

The German educational exchange program (Public Law 535, 81st Cong.).

Thirdly, we feel that independent status for the program would make it more difficult for the program to operate effectively at the overseas missions. Under the present set-up, the Foreign Service officers assigned to this program are a part of the regular Foreign Service establishments. Their work is integrated with the official diplomatic work. It is our opinion that if our educational exchange officers operated in establishments separate from the embassies, their work could not be as closely and effectively tied in with other embassy activities.

We feel, however, that some improvements can be made in the organization of the program by making adjustments within the framework of the Department of State itself. By the close of 1951 the two programs of Public Law 402 will account for around one-half of the employees and half of the total of the appropriations of the Department of State. Also, the operations of the information and educational exchange programs differ from other activities of the Department of State which historically have given primary emphasis to the diplomatic and political side of international relations. It is logical and desirable for special provisions to be made for the two programs so as to insure increased flexibility and increased speed of operations. With these considerations in mind we feel that the over-all status of the program in the Department should be studied. We have been informed that the Department is doing this and we look forward to reviewing the results of any surveys conducted.

(This recommendation is being submitted to the Department of State simultaneously with this report to the Congress. Therefore, no departmental reply can be reported at this time.)

B. RELATIONSHIP OF THE INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAMS AND COMMISSIONS

This Commission discussed with the Commission on Information the question as to whether the information and educational exchange programs, and the two Advisory Commissions, could more profitably be combined into a single undertaking. Both Commissions agreed that the direction of both by one assistant secretary and a single general manager, as well as the direction of both in the field by a single public affairs officer, provided adequate coordination.

(No departmental action required.)

C. COORDINATION WITH THE ADVISORY BOARD ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Commission on Educational Exchange and the Advisory Board on International Development have taken steps to insure the coordination of their respective activities. This has been considered necessary because of the interrelation of the programs upon which both bodies advise.

A member of each body has been appointed to specialize on the policies and operations of the other board. If either specialist finds several USIS posts in Latin American countries. His report to the Commission is submitted as an appendix hereto.

The Commission has given considerable thought to the question of how it can manage to provide Congress with more comprehensive independent appraisals, within the limits of the time and facilities at its disposal. The Commission has neither the time nor inclination to become an operating agency, even in the vital matter of independent evaluation. Its members will however continue, when possible, to make short trips to the field.

In addition, the Commission has recommended and the State Department has set up seven advisory committees (as provided in P. L. 402). The composition and scope of these committees is described later in this report. One of their most useful consequences will be the availability of Committee members for private evaluations of the information program, through their various overseas contacts and trips. On these committees are outstanding national experts in the various media. They will be able to give invaluable help in judging the effectiveness of the program according to the best known standards of communication information.

II. Should the Information Program be placed in a separate agency, or given stronger status inside the State Department?

This Commission has no vested interest in the placement of the information program. We are solely concerned with its maximum effectiveness. If we were persuaded that it could function more effectively outside the State Department, we would feel obligated to say so. But our experience has led us to have grave doubts that the program in the hands of a separate agency would operate as well as it does now. We believe the subject requires very careful study. We would therefore gladly endorse the proposals in Congress for an investigation of the information program, although we hope the investigation will not completely monopolize the time of those trying to administer these operations.

Pending the results of such an investigation, and for what it may be worth, here are our own observations based on two and a half years of scrutiny:

One vital requisite in the handling of the information program is that it shall not be remote from policy-planning. Another equally significant need is that the United States abroad should speak with a single voice. There can be separate tones and modulations in that voice, and a choice of vocabularies, but the voice should not contradict itself. We do not believe that O. W. I. operations in World War II were altogether happy as far as policy-coordination is concerned.

We recognize freely that if Congress agrees to set up an information agency of cabinet rank, and if it creates enough top jobs at relatively good salaries, and if the right man can be persuaded to head the agency, and if some kind of exemption from F. B. I. clearances prior to hiring personnel can be legislated, there is a chance that the proposed agency could get better personnel than is now employed. These are big ifs.

And, of course, the separate agency would require substantially larger appropriations than are now available to the State Department, for it would require its own house-keeping arrangements and many facilities it now gets by virtue of being inside the department. Likewise, the higher rated jobs would require a higher payroll.

These presumed advantages would not apply to the transfer of the information program to the Economic Cooperation Administration, as proposed by Senator Chavez. Such a shift would not up-grade the present jobs.

But transfer to E. C. A., as well as to a separate agency, would inevitably tend to set up rival U. S. Embassies in foreign capitals. One would be the regular State Department Embassy. The other would be the E. C. A. or the information set-up. Strenuous efforts would be needed, and in the past they have not always been successful, to bridge the gulf between two such entities. Even to require that everything should clear through the regular Ambassador does not solve the problem.

Thus the chasm between the information program and policy--which this Commission has tried so earnestly to help close--would begin to yawn again. At times there would seem to be two policies: the official State Department one, and the one being promulgated by the information people. This would be a deplorable state of affairs.

No propaganda can be any stronger than the policy from which it springs. Thus the information specialists should be at all times and at all levels just as close as they possibly can be to the making of policy. Sometimes policy is "made" by the junior officer who writes an original memorandum. Sometimes it is made by an unexpected utterance at a top-level press conference. But the information consequences of policy ought always be taken into account, and the information man ought always to be consulted. Since most foreign policy is made by the State Department, the closer the information program can be to the State Department, the more effective the propaganda will be. This is true provided a qualified group of specialists has been organized to do the operating of the information program. That is the present case.

There is one argument for a separate agency which lies in the realm of practical politics. The State Department is a "target area", politically, and has been so in one way or another for many years. It would be refreshing to give the information program the advantages of a honeymoon period, at least, before the shafts and arrows start flying. But this is a minor advantage, after all, compared to the massive handicap of separating policy from information.

These considerations seem very important to us. But we would not be dogmatic on the question. Let it be investigated. Particularly, there should be investigation of whether the advantages--or most of them--of a separate agency can be created inside the State Department. We would be very interested in a program raising the information activities to the level of the Under-Secretary of State, and giving them new administrative flexibilities they do not presently have. By the end of 1951 nearly half the employees of the State Department will be in the information program, and nearly half the Department's appropriations will be expended for that purpose. It would seem essential to give such a program appropriate organizational weight inside the Department, rather than pyramiding it under the relatively low level of an Assistant Secretary of State. We recommend this subject be carefully explored.

III. Broadening the Commission's Channels to the Public.

The Commission has been most desirous to carry out the purposes of Public Law 402 by opening up wider channels of contact with appropriate professional and private sources. To that end, under the authority of the Act, it has recommended and the State Department has set up seven advisory committees. Personnel of three of the committees have already received preliminary clearance and they are at work. The other four are currently in process of clearance, and all will soon be complete. The committees, widely representative of each field are:

Dear Mr. Lindley:

I have just read your article and the news item in your Newsweek Magazine on the death of Mr. Lawrence Duggan. Having had an experience in raising a window in a New York skyscraper myself, and nearly falling out, I think it plain that his death was accidental. From the fact that he wore one overshoe, I would suppose that he was preparing to go home, and had put on one overshoe, got dizzy or hot from bending down, and wanted some air. Had he raised the window at that time, he might have had my experience-- my window shot up unexpectedly fast, and I found myself with my arms raised, and my body surging forward out of the window, while the view downward frightened me almost enough to make me let go and fall. The impulse I had was to let go the window handles and try to catch something back in the room. But fortunately I did not do so, and regained my balance almost at once. I have always thought since then that all New York windows should be barred, to prevent such accidents. That was some years ago, and still frightens me when I think of it. Today, with my back weak, I can well imagine that a similar situation would be the end of me, and your magazine stated that Mr. Duggan had some spinal pain. This alone could have given him enough of a spasmodic twist to send him through the open window. Furthermore his rubber-shod foot could have slipped and thrown him, especially if any snow fell inwards as he raised the window, or if the floor was slippery.

If it had not been for the spectacular jump by Mrs. Kasenkina and the similar fate of Mr. Masaryk, I do not believe anyone would have suggested Mr. Duggan would take his own life, even if he were not, as his friends have emphasized, a man of fine character.

I think perhaps your article may be of great comfort to his bereaved family, as indicating that Mr. Duggan's death and its dramatising of a reprehensible state of affairs in the Congressional technique may lead to a reform there that will save some other patriotic soul from the agony of unfounded slander. Perhaps if members of the investigating committee had less other work to do they would have time to be briefed on judicial methods. Perhaps the work of such a committee should not be superimposed on a regular Congressman's duties, but outside experts should be employed.

Yours very truly,

A Well-Informed Public Is America's Greatest Security

BLUSH: Our editorial faces are red over a small Periscope item that came true too quickly last week. It accurately predicted that Executive Director Gael Sullivan of the Democratic National Committee would be "persuaded" to withdraw his resignation. But while most copies of the magazine were in transit to readers, President Truman abruptly did the persuading and announced it to the press, making the prediction a predication by the time it reached readers. Unlike his predecessor, Mr. Truman makes a habit of such sudden announcements. The President's boosters call the speedy Truman method "decisive." His critics call it "overhasty." We call it embarrassing—at times.

CORROBORATION: Just ten years ago, there appeared in NEWSWEEK a statement from its publisher defining the magazine's editorial aim of "reporting events in their proper perspective . . ." Impartial reporting in perspective has been our chief editorial purpose in the succeeding decade.

We were strongly reminded of that goal the other night by a radio news analyst's description of his responsibility to the listener. He used phrases that have appeared fairly frequently on this page since its inception. The broadcaster was Edward R. Murrow of CBS. His words are worth repeating:

"News programs are broadcast solely for the purpose of enabling the listeners thereto to know facts—so far as they are ascertainable—and so to elucidate, illuminate and explain facts and situations as fairly to enable the listener to weigh and judge for himself . . . [The analyst] endeavors to assist the listener in weighing and judging developments throughout the world, but refrains particularly with respect to all controversial, political, social and economic questions from trying to make up the listener's mind for him.

"Being human we will probably make mistakes, and the only thing that can be said about that in advance is that we shall do our utmost to be the first to correct them."

HIT FROM DIXIE: Last month Music Editor Emily Coleman was leafing through Billboard to catch up on some trade news when the name "Francis Craig" caught her eye. He had written a song, "Near You," which appeared to be on its way up on the charts. From her prom-trotting (Texas to Tennessee) days, Miss Coleman remembered Craig as an exceptional bandleader who held forth in Nashville's Hermitage Hotel. Slightly from nostalgia, but mostly for a story, she called Nashville, dug up background, and wrote a piece for NEWSWEEK's Sept. 15 issue, singling out Craig and his tune for particular notice. "Near You" bears out her story, leading all tunes in the nation's juke-boxes and disk-jockey programs and in sheet-music and retail record sales.

THE COVER: Superman of British politics during the war, Winston Churchill was reduced to the stature of party leader by his 1945 election defeat. But the Conservative convention at Brighton, England, proved that he is still the superman of his party even though some Tories have criticized him for what they consider his old-fashioned views. This British Combine picture shows Churchill, hat held against the sun, addressing a crowd in Walthamstow Stadium, North London (see page 30).

Dear Ed:

I am delighted with the news in the attached story from the Times and I congratulate the British government on its acumen. I also like the reassuring news from the doctor that you're merely in the hospital "for a further checkup".

I'm leaving for Phoenix today and won't be back until April 9, to be here for only 12 days before I go to London and Paris for the Spring UNESCO meetings. Perhaps you'll be able to lunch with me in April. We are still hopeful that you and your wife will be able to drive to Southport for an evening with us. We're planning to spend most of the summer there.

I send you my warmest best wishes.

Sincerely,

Bill

Dear Ed:

I'm leaving this week for six weeks and one of my goals is to convalesce from the pneumonia I picked up at the inauguration. We're both running into bad luck. I'll be here for two weeks in April on the way to the UNESCO spring meeting in Paris. I'll check in with you then. I'm glad to hear you're in those wonderful Dakota apartments.

Dear Bill,

So far as I know, I will be right here the first week of December and probably until mid-January. If you find it convenient, why don't you give me a shout when you get back from Europe?

I am delighted Walter Kotschnig will be with you in Paris. Do give him my regards. We used to labor in the same vineyard more than thirty years ago. He is a very stout citizen, indeed.

As ever,

Dear Walter:

Most people don't realize that the Merriam-Webster dictionary is by far the best dictionary of English. For more than a hundred years it has benefited by a regular rhythm of revisions. For example, in the 1962 "3rd International" - every one of the definitions and citations of the 400,000 entries - every single one is different from the "2nd International" of 1934. The Oxford dictionary hasn't been revised in 40 years, if then. Yes, Webster's editor told me that the Oxford people put out a "supplement" in 1928.

Ed Murrow and I once agreed that the most important long range propaganda objectives of the United States and Great Britain should be the teaching of English. Confidentially, my own present tentative opinion is that we shall convert all Britannica publications from the British spelling to the standards of the Webster dictionary. We shall make a major assault throughout the world on behalf of the Merriam-Webster standards. We shall advocate these American standards in competition with the obsolete Oxford standards. This is indeed a very important move by the Britannica - and it's a move on behalf of the United States. It is our own brand of American cultural imperialism! Do you know that you are the only one to write me a letter stressing that what I am doing "is of great importance in the cultural life of the English speaking world"? I understand it fully well. Very few people seem to. All of my letters stress the business achievement. None of them stress the cultural significance.

Thank you for the speech by Henri Laugier. I'm hoping to get a chance to read it before I leave Tuesday.

As I told the press, I am going to take the Merriam-Webster dictionary to the world.

I am looking forward to Paris in considerable part because you are to be there.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy would have been 47 today. The Encyclopaedia Britannica from 1961 through 1963 was dedicated to President Kennedy and to Queen Elizabeth II as heads of the two great English-speaking peoples. The Britannica will now mark his 1964 birthday with the publication of a memorial book, "A Tribute to John F. Kennedy."

Because I know you would wish to share the tribute with us, I am asking the Chicago headquarters of the Britannica to send you a copy, with my personal regards.

"A Tribute to John F. Kennedy" is a selection from those thousands of remarkable and eloquent statements evoked within hours by the President's assassination. It is edited by Pierre Salinger and Sander Vanocur. The foreword is by Theodore Sorensen. The dedication is by President Johnson. The net proceeds will go to the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library in Cambridge, Mass., of which I am a Trustee and the Trustees of which have authorized this publication.

According to a most reliable source, the rumors that Edward R. Murrow is returning to CBS are, happily and thankfully, true. His recuperation from his lung cancer operation has come along well enough for him to plan a return to work, and CBS News, under the new aegis of Fred W. Friendly, certainly wants Mr. Murrow. His doctors will, at the end of this month, decide just exactly how much he can do for his old network. The news may have been formally announced before this column appears, but news as good as that bears repetition.

I dug out the card. Here it is. I wriggle a bit in distress when I see how young I looked in my picture. Why do you remind me of the days when I looked as if a red-haired girl might want to look at me?

I hear from John Howe who picks up news through his Book Committee that your doctors have decided that the so-called "cobalt treatment" is no longer indicated - "and two weeks earlier than in the case of Arthur Godfrey". This sounds most reassuring.

We have a lot to talk about. Please catch up with me as soon as you can.

Dear Ed:

Your letter about the Reserve Corps precipitates the letter I've been meaning to write you. I hear good reports on your recovery. But I think you were probably wise to resign and give up, for the present, the intense pace the best men in the government subject themselves to.

John Howe, at his Book Committee, has been getting good reports on you from Don Wilson, Gordon Ewing and Reed Harris. They have said, for example, that the doctors decided the cobalt treatment was no longer indicated - and two weeks earlier than in the case of Arthur Godfrey. But the reports I get also indicate that you have been impatient to get back on that ten or twelve hours a day regime. And that's why I think you're wise to get out from under the pressure and give yourself a real convalescence. You will always be in demand in the administration - and if you aren't, you'll be in demand by me!

And what do you think of Carl Rowan as your successor? If he is as good as he sounds, this was a very smart move.

I shall of course turn in my "Civil Defense Identification Card". I'm not sure how to interpret the second paragraph of your letter - whether to take it as a good sign, or a very ominous one. But I'll say this: I admire you and the Agency for cutting off the Reserve Corps when it no longer has a valid reason for being. All too often such groups go on and on, needed or not.

Here's my 45,000-word manuscript about Latin America for the Britannica 1961 Yearbook. You asked for it. I'm not urging you to read it. But if you do read it, or any parts of it, and have comments for me - I shall be profoundly grateful. The truth is I've been frustrated on this piece. If I had it to do over again, I never would have agreed to write it. I haven't had the fresh original material that I developed on my visit to the U.S.S.R. five years ago. I have felt I'm largely using worked-over material. I was greatly surprised that Mark Childs praised it so highly. I shall be pleased if you like it. If I had to pick the best section, I'd pick the one on education. I've been assured that much of this is fresh, particularly my observations on Latin American universities. Office of the President

TO ALL FIELD AND HOME OFFICE PERSONNEL:

I am happy to inform you of the appointment of Harry S. Ashmore as editor-in-chief of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

A Pulitzer Prize winner, Mr. Ashmore is one of America's outstanding journalists and authors. He was a Nieman Fellow at Harvard, holds degrees from Oberlin and Clemson Colleges, and has most recently been closely affiliated with the chairman of EB's board of editors, Robert M. Hutchins, as a consultant to the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, of which Dr. Hutchins is the director.

I am sure that you share with me and our chairman and publisher, William Benton, our pleasure in this important event in EB's long and interesting history.

As editor-in-chief, Mr. Ashmore will be responsible for the overall and long range aspects of EB publications, working closely with Dr. Hutchins and the board of editors. Executive editor Jack Dodge will continue to have operating responsibility for our vast and complex editorial procedures and activities. As you are aware, Jack Dodge has been doing an excellent job in carrying out the expanded duties assigned to him as executive editor.

Our new editor-in-chief has been a writer and journalist since his youth in Greenville, S. C., where he was born July 28, 1916. After working on the Greenville Piedmont, Greenville News and the Charlotte (N. C.) News, he won a coveted Nieman Fellowship for a year's study at Harvard. During World War II, he rose from second lieutenant to Lieutenant colonel during combat service in France, the Rhineland and Central Europe.

In September 1947, he accepted an invitation to become editor of the Arkansas Gazette's editorial page and later became its executive editor. In 1958, he won the Pulitzer Prize—and, in an unprecedented move, so did his newspaper—for his powerfully written editorials on the school integration crisis at Little Rock. In addition, he also won the Sidney Hillman Award and the Freedom House Award.

A contributor to scores of national magazines, Mr. Ashmore is an author of considerable distinction. "An Epitaph for Dixie" has been called "the most significant contemporary book by a Southerner about the South." After heading a 40-scholar team that studied bi-racial education in the United States under auspices of the Ford Foundation's Fund for the Advancement of Education, he wrote "The Negro and the Schools." Another book, "This Side of Jordan," is to be published later this year.

I know you will join me in welcoming Harry Ashmore. I am confident that he will make vital and lasting contributions to the maintenance and expansion of EB's deserved reputation as "the reference standard of the world."

Sincerely yours,

Harry E. Houghton

TEACHER VS. MACHINE—Traditional education, as above, calls for the teacher's personal guidance of pupils. The machine that may take the teacher's place, at least in part, is at right, opened to show the problems and correct answers and the blank paper for students' responses. At far right, a girl confronts the statement: "When we turn on a flashlight, an electric current flows through the fine wire in the _____ and causes it to grow hot." She writes "filament" for the missing word. When she opens the black flap beside the problem she will learn at once that the correct answer should be "bulb."

The Three R's And Pushbuttons

Forward-lookers are experimenting with machines that teach, and traditionalists wonder if the schoolmarm is to be a mechanic.

By DAVID BOROFF

THE Age of Technology has finally overtaken education, and the shape of the classroom of the future—assuming there will even be so retrograde an institution—is open to speculation. To the imposing array of television screens, films, tape recordings and language laboratories, there has now been added the teaching machine, the very name of which is either an affront or a sign that education has finally been inducted into the twentieth century.

The coming of age of the teaching machine was highlighted recently by the announcement of Encyclopaedia Britannica Films that it is adapting the entire high school mathematics curriculum, a large share of college mathematics, and eight years of foreign-language study for machine instruction. This climaxes more than thirty years of preliminary exploration of these devices. At present, courses in Russian, statistics, freshman English, music, genetics—even the Old Testament—are being prepared for teaching machines in a variety of institutions.

What are teaching machines? Can the classroom indeed be transformed into an aseptic assembly line of learning? Are schools going to be miniature Willow Runs replete with pushbutton instruction? Are teaching machines a pipe dream, Orwellian nightmare, or a soundly conceived breakthrough in educational method?

THE teaching machine, as developed by Prof. B. F. Skinner of Harvard University, is a simple mechanical device which presents information and questions to a student. The material is printed on a roll, which is fed to the student a little at a time. (It is called programed material; the term comes from the burgeoning field of computers.) The teaching machine itself is a small box about the size of a record player. Across the box are three rectangular windows or panels. The programed material is presented in the left-hand panel. The student reads the information there, and in the second panel writes the answers to a question. He then turns a knob which reveals the correct answer in a third panel. If his answer is identical with that of the answer panel, he pulls a lever and goes on to the next item. If his response does not match that of the answer panel, he pulls another lever so that when he has completed the lesson, the machine will return to the question incorrectly answered. The operation is as simple, according to one machine psychologist, as adjusting a television set—a statement hardly calculated to allay fears of this new wave of technology.

A few principles underlie teaching machines. One is that material has to be presented with absolute clarity and simplicity—information distilled to its essence. The second principle is that the machine offers what psychologists call "immediate reinforcement," or reward. In classroom terms, a reinforcement may be a good grade, a teacher's smile, or any of the numerous bribes by which children are motivated. With teaching machines, the reinforcement is the simple pleasure of being right—no small reward in our academically motivated culture.

ONE of the chief advances of the teaching machine over conventional methods of instruction is that reinforcement is immediate. The child absorbs information and applies it instantly in answering a question. In traditional arrangements, reinforcement—the satisfaction of being right—has to wait until homework is corrected in class or test papers returned a week or two after the material is initially taught. By that time, the reinforcement has lost a good deal of its potency.

Here is some material from a program in elementary physics. The machine presents one item at a time. The student completes the item, then uncovers the correct answer as shown at the right. Note how the information gradually grows in complexity, how it back- (Continued on Page 66)

It is apparent that through this process of breaking knowledge down into its simplest components, many subjects can be programed. Programing is particularly adaptable to skill and tool subjects—mathematics, spelling, punctuation, foreign languages. Even fact-crammed subjects like history can be programed by slicing away the fat and presenting the lean, hard facts which lie close to the bones of events. And, as indicated above, the pupil's assimilation of factual material is tested item by item as he goes along.

Proponents of teaching machines, a notably militant group, have a powerful arsenal of arguments. They assert that their machines lead not to the mechanization of learning but to the goal, so piously sought, of individualized instruction. Some call the machines "mechanical tutors" and argue that we now have within reach the optimal arrangement of one tutor and one pupil in each learning situation. (It was once said that the ideal college would be a log in the woods with educator Mark Hopkins at one end and a student at the other; now Hopkins has been implausibly transformed into a teaching box.)

MOREOVER, in the conventional classroom, the student has to wrestle with his own passivity and inertia. Using the machine, he is in constant interaction with programed material. Finally, if, as the psychologists insist, reinforcement is the key to learning, the machine can provide far more reinforcements than a teacher who has to distribute them among all her pupils.

"The simple truth," Professor Skinner has written, "is that as a mere reinforcing mechanism the teacher is out of date."

With teaching machines, students can move at their own rate of speed. Bright youngsters can romp through a program swiftly and move on to new ones. Dull students can take their time.

Another revolutionary feature of the teaching machine is that it is predicated on almost universal success. Instead of the current travesty of automatic promotion, a psychologist has argued, there will be automatic achievement. Everybody is expected to do well. The expertise of the programing will presumably enable even dull students—or those previously regarded as dull—to grasp the material presented.

In conventional classes, an examination in which everyone does well is immediately suspect. "I never regarded myself as sadistic," Skinner recently observed, "but when I started to program I realized that I was making things harder than I should. Teachers generally want students to be wrong. If everyone knows the answers to questions, teachers make them tougher. With teaching machines, you give the students every opportunity to be right."

A FINAL argument in their behalf is that teaching machines may provide a realistic solution for shortages of classrooms and teachers. Skinner envisions fifteen-minute machine sessions. This means a far shorter school day than at present. There is even the possibility of using the machines at home with only certain group activities taking place in what we now know as the school.

Nor are the claims of the machine psychologists mere rhetoric, for there are concrete results. At Harvard, Professor Skinner's students have been using machines in a psychology course and performing creditably.

Even more striking were the results last spring in Roanoke, Va., where a group of eighth-grade students in a junior high school studied algebra—a ninth-grade subject — without teacher, textbook or homework, using only machines and programed material. This experiment was under the direction of Dr. Allen Calvin of Hollins College. These children covered an entire year's work in one term—twice the normal quota. On national exams in algebra, their performance was impressive, despite the fact that they were competing with children a year older than they. The average score of the Roanoke test group fell in the lower end of the average category for ninth graders, but 41 per cent of the children surpassed the average score attained by ninth graders. Only one Roanoke child fell in the "very low" category.

THE consensus of other experimenters seems to be that, with teaching machines, students can learn at twice the speed of those being conventionally taught.

How did the Roanoke children react to the experience? Affirmatively, it would appear. At the conclusion of the experiment, only 16 per cent of the children preferred a return to regular instruction. More than half opted for a combination of teacher and machine.

Informal reactions ran a colorful gamut and demonstrated that, machines or no, children are stubbornly themselves. "I like not having to do homework," a boy said. A go-getting girl observed: "It challenges you to get ahead of someone else." Another youngster, sounding as if he had been well-reinforced by machines, stated magisterially: "In regular class you learn something and forget it and have to learn it again. Here you learn it the first time."

The principal of the junior high school manifested a wary enthusiasm: "I had a show-me attitude at first. You might say I'm from Missouri. But I'm real pleased now. I thought the novelty would wear off, that the youngsters would dawdle. But they didn't."

THE function of the teacher in this experiment was merely to straighten out mechanical breakdowns. She walked around, somewhat wanly, with a screwdriver instead of a rollbook. "I think education has not progressed as fast as other things," she said. "We're due for some changes. That's why I was glad to try this."

Despite the impressive results, the critics of teaching machines are vociferously unpersuaded. They range from a professor of history who said in accents of deep Spenglerian gloom, "It's the end of Western civilization," to uneasy collaborationists full of unresolved skepticism.

First, the very idea of mechanization in schools is repugnant to many people. "What will be the effect," a teacher asked anxiously, "of a generation of students who sit in front of a machine all day and go click-click?"

Objectors also point out the obvious limitations of teaching machines. At their present level, machines are admirably equipped to teach facts and skills, and, humbling as the thought may be, they seem to do so more efficiently than human beings.

But there is an immense area of education—perhaps the most crucial area—in which facts alone are useless. Values, feelings, convictions, the very things we live by—these cannot be precisely analyzed or programed. About the central questions of human existence there are no form answers—only other questions, partial answers, and infinitely complicated modulations of feelings and ideas. Here teaching machines are helpless.

MACHINE material is open to the same objections as all short-answer questions: there is only a right answer—and a wrong one. The modulated response, or what John Keats called "negative capability"—the capacity to sustain doubt—is unattainable with machines. There is danger of an intellectually efficient but robotized generation emerging from machine instruction.

Teaching machines, for example, can impart information about art, but they cannot teach us how to react to paintings—except in the most terrifyingly robotized fashion. Machines can provide facts about international politics and test students' absorption of them, but they cannot provide answers for international problems. Machines can show young people how to punctuate and how to negotiate the treacherous complexities of syntax, but they cannot teach them how to think through an idea or express themselves with grace and force.

IN that technological Arcadia of the future, the great decisions about life, for which education is designed to prepare us, will still be made in the lonely recesses of the human mind and heart. And they will issue from struggle and guesswork and passionate conviction, with the teacher fulfilling her traditional role as midwife in this agony of gestation and birth.

Comparing teaching machines to tutors is, in a real sense, disingenuous, for the essence of the tutorial process is free discussion, which may start with monetary theory and end with the values by which one orders one's life. No machine can do that.

The most strenuous objections, therefore, have to do with the role of the teacher. Everyone can remember a few magnificent teachers in his school career whose function far transcended merely imparting information. Through some special, indefinable gift, they were able to bring to life the high drama of ideas. It is through a kinetic encounter with a teacher of this kind that a student is recruited into the intellectual life. What will happen to teachers in an educational setting dominated by teaching machines? To bring up an everlasting question, who will inspire students? At best, teaching machines can merely motivate.

In a teaching-machine culture, the best pedagogic talent will be drafted into the programing end of the profession. This has the obvious merit of providing excellent program material for all. (Just as we can remember the occasional giant among teachers, we also recall, with a shudder of distaste, the dreary procession of mediocrities.) But programing has the effect, too, of pulling good teachers out of the classroom and of reducing, or ending, the creative interaction among teachers, student and subject-matter.

CRITICS are keenly aware that teaching-machine spokesmen have been less than clear about the future role of the teacher. For the most part, they talk about interpersonal relations as the sphere of the newly liberated teacher—as if interpersonal relations can be practiced in any meaningful way independently of subject-matter. "The teacher will be a human being with some students, while others are on the machine," a psychologist said. There are those who invoke the talismanic word "enrichment."

In mathematics, it was suggested, the teacher, free of the bondage of algebra and geometry, would present the relationship of mathematics to the space age—an interesting subject but not mathematics.

Some of the moderate advocates of teaching machines see them merely as auxiliary instruments for rote instruction. The teacher, relieved of many mechanical chores, will continue to fulfill her time-honored functions of explaining, guiding and inspiring. But critics fear that hard-core machine proponents might be reluctant to let highly fallible teachers defile the work of the nearly perfect machines. They distrust the argument that a teacher, after all, merely deploys her own limited skills, while a machine program embodies the sophisticated efforts of a team of topnotch experimental psychologists (concerned with learning theory) and subject-matter specialists. They are not reassured by a psychologist's brusque assertion: "The teacher's function will be custodial—to keep children out of their mothers' hair."

One has to ask, also, what will happen to reading habits when students are conditioned to learn even complex material through a highly distilled, atomized presentation? The reading of discursive texts—a crude, nonreinforcing technique — might conceivably be a casualty.

Finally, those who have peered critically at the literature of the teaching-machine psychologists see in it a design for behavioral control. The strong emphasis on positive reinforcement seems somewhat Pavlovian. One psychologist, for example, sees education as "an integrated culture which [will undertake] the guidance of the individual's growth and development as a serious task of planned cultural conditioning." This kind of Faustian thinking worries some observers who point to the tragic miscarriage of Utopian ventures in the past.

ONLY the most defiantly old-fashioned would fail to agree that full exploration should be made of teaching machines. Incorporated within a context in which humane values are firmly anchored, machines may, indeed, bring about a new vitality and efficacy in our schools. The immediate task is to unite the machine more effectively with the classroom teacher, whose ministrations are even more vital in an increasingly machine-dominated world.

Educators, in making use of this revolutionary body of ideas, should avoid equally the delaying tactics of the inveterate enemies of change, and the headlong impetuosity of the new radicals, naively enchanted with their shiny technology.

ROBOT—Teaching machines vary in design according to their purpose. This one, "Tutor," is for industrial and military use.

Dear Ed:

Here is Harry Ashmore's memo on the proposed "Commission". And I am also sending my hasty memo of criticism of it - to John Howe. And I am further sending an equally hasty memo to Bob Hutchins which reports on my lunch with Harry Luce.

I look forward to talking to you about all these matters next week.

And of course today again persuaded me that we don't catch up with each other enough. I had forgotten that I was after you way back in 1945 when I wanted to make you "official spokesman" for the State Department!

Hastily,

I too have just given Harry Ashmore's memorandum a very fast reading. My offhand reaction is good. But doesn't it go into too much detail? Every specific proposal breeds critics. Might it not be better if it stuck to broad generalities - expecting the Commission, when set up and active, to work out the details?

Yes, I would like a stronger case made as to why this is a logical activity of a great university - and an important one.

I have no fear about tax exemption - under the aegis of any of our great universities. I don't believe I'd bring the question up.

Of course many publications of the projected Commission would be in the names of staff members who are faculty members of the university.

Yes, I think it would be a good thing if you saw Harry before he saw Griswold. I think he should build up his document "as to why a university should want to welcome such a Commission...." (But you will note from Harry's letter that President Griswold has already, apparently, been supplied with a copy of the memorandum).

Do you weigh properly the manner in which a commission "takes stands on controverted issues"? What the commission is doing is commenting on the progress of the mass media during the current year. Sitting judiciously and objectively in this great role of critic, quite naturally it comes up with some criticisms. But the commission isn't in the business of being a critic. A commission is in the business of reporting on the progress of the mass media. The criticism is incidental. Taking stands on public issues is an incidental outgrowth of the primary function of the commission.

This distinction seems to me to be important.

I suggest you read this document again and consult with me further. Harry Ashmore is in Chicago this week. I think I should write him before the week is out and before he arrives here in New York next week.

How of great importance are these names. The commission can't be any better than the men. Can we secure good men? This list of names makes me wonder whether we can. If we can't, the whole idea of a commission becomes unreal.

I do not think we can expect men who are active in public life, and who are thus dependent on the mass media, to take appointment to the commission. And doesn't this apply to everyone of these "public men" with a possible exception of Bishop Wright with whom I'm not familiar?

I would say it is easier to acquire suitable educators. But aren't Frank Graham and Allan Nevins much too old? Further, Conant must be 70 and Archie McLeish is past 65. Thus these two are very difficult to select.

The group "from the media" seems to be the best, and this is surprising because offhand it would seem to me that this is the most difficult of the groups to select. But I'm sure Mark Etheridge wouldn't accept appointment, and Ray Rubicam was almost 70 wouldn't either.

We've got to think of better men, I am afraid, if our idea is to hang together. Where can we find men who deem this proposition to be sufficiently important to be willing to devote real time to it? And men who have no further interest in public appointment or public service. Can they be found?

I think Anna Rosenberg might have ideas on commissioners. Are you still meeting with her regularly? Why don't you talk to her about this. Most of the public men I think of, who seem to have graduated from the battle of public competition, either won't admit that they have graduated - or might refuse the assignment on other grounds. Jack Bailey is 65 but he's president of the Ford Foundation. Averell Harriman is running for Secretary of State. And newspapers say that Bob Lovett is ill. And so it goes.

Of course if Nixon is elected, and Governor Stevenson would consent to head up this commission - this would indeed be the dream set-up and around the personality of this one remarkable man - a top commission could be established.

My lists will have to be combed for candidates. Ernest Gruen is a good possibility. And what about Eddie Miller? Please take a look at the subcommittees of the Democratic Advisory Council!

One major criticism, and it is an important one - that I have of Harry's memo - is on page 12. Note my question marks. I think it is going to be a very tough assignment to get a good director and a good principal associate - without setting up the requirement that they must be "professionals of demonstrated capacity drawn from the media". No such requirement should be established. I wouldn't object to a statement saying that preference should be given to men chosen from the media if men with proper qualifications can be found.

To: Dr. Robert M. Hutchins and
Mr. Harry Ashmore

From: William Benton

Harry Luce thinks that the Commission must consist of "pros". He spent half an hour describing to me the attitude of a pro towards a newspaper. A pro understands the need for the women's pages, the pattern pages, the comic strips; the pro knows that support has got to be given for the local boy scouts, symphony orchestras and other community activities. The pro may pay very little attention to the first page and the editorial page. The pro knows that the newspaper is a public utility, dedicated to the service of the community.

Now when Harry starts to pin down a pro, he volunteers that Eddie Bernays, whom he doesn't like, qualifies as a pro. When I asked him about Allen Nevins, he agreed. But he does not agree on Whit Griswold, merely because he has experience in dealing with the newspapers. And he says of Nixon and Kennedy that they understand how to handle a press conference - but are not pros. Similarly, he suggests that people like Hocking were not wise choices for the Luce Commission. (He has assured me is going to review the 1947 report over this week end).

Harry and I did not come to terms on this. But I told him that I thought the success of the Commission depended on getting the right men to serve on it. He wants men who have had the experience and who probably are now older statesmen. He mentioned John Cowles with enthusiasm. (John Cowles resents an article in TIME published while Harry was in Europe which stated that John's son was taking over in Minneapolis).

I told Harry that I thought we could get the financial support if we could get the right members for the Commission. He agrees. He is going to talk to Harry Ashmore about the right kind of membership.

Harry says that he will make a token contribution to the Commission, if we set it up properly, but that his Foundation is over committed. Harry thinks he is in a dream position to get the Rockefeller Foundation to put up real money. He says he can do the arm twisting. I told him I was skeptical, that the Rockefeller Foundation has never put money into this kind of enterprise. I told him something of my frustration in the 30's when I was at the University of Chicago.

He thinks the time is ripe for the Rockefeller Foundation to finance the right kind of Commission, and is confident he can get the money. We both spoke warmly of Dean Rusk.

Harry brought up the idea that the Commission should be dedicated to television and radio and should come into the press "perhaps eight years from now". I told him I had had the same idea. He says that it will be easier to get men on the Commission; that most of the men will applaud the idea; that it would be easier to get financing; that the Commission will then be studying problems of the kind listed by Harry Ashmore - problems about which something can be done. His point that the Commission can affect television and radio, and can be influential on decisions currently before the FCC and the Congress - whereas it cannot affect the press - is exactly the same argument that I used. I told Harry that I had made the same recommendation. Harry feels very strongly about this.

Harry says he is no longer trying to work on committees of The Fund for the Republic and that this has been true for a year.

I reported to him Harry Ashmore's discussion with Whit Griswold. Not only does he not regard Griswold as a "pro", but he thinks that no university is likely to want to tie up with the Commission - though he agrees with my arguments that a university tie-up would be advisable if it can be arranged. He said, "Wouldn't you do better at Chicago? Why don't you go west?"

Harry thinks the possibility of getting several universities to cooperate is very remote. He agrees that universities have a tough time cooperating on anything - and why should they find it easy in a tough area like this?

I believe that Harry feels a considerable sense of responsibility for this idea because the Commission of 1947 is known as "The Luce Commission". He is encouraging if the idea develops along the lines he recommends; otherwise he is discouraging. I myself would be willing to settle for a Commission of "pros" providing we can get good ones. He emphasized that experience in advertising made a man a pro. This would admit Ray Rubicam. He thinks that somebody who has been a big time broadcaster ought to be included. He favors a woman who will know about women's interests. He applauds Bruce and Beatrice Gould, and I told him that perhaps Beatrice could be more needed than Bruce - and he agreed, stating that he regarded her as a very smart woman. He wants some big figure from the entertainment world. When I suggested Rory Shary, he turned cold. He says that Shary is an ardent left-winger and even if he issued orders to the staff of TIME - he could not persuade his staff people to take a friendly view towards a Commission on the press of which Shary is a member. I did not come up with any other specific suggestions. Thus he wants not only "pros" but he wants a balanced panel - pros from many different fields of interest. I hope Harry Ashmore will have talked to him further about these views.

When I asked him to talk to Harry, he was uncertain as to what to talk to him about. When I told him I wanted him to talk specifically with Harry about the make-up of the Commission, he agreed. This interests him. Incidentally, the names of projected Commission members, which came to me from Bob Hutchins and Harry Ashmore, were not included in the memorandum which Harry had read. I suggest that Harry Ashmore take these names along with him when he calls on Harry Luce - and supplement them with any extra names he can think about. Will Harry Ashmore also try to pin down with Harry Luce any other points on which we are eager to get his commitment?

PROPOSAL FOR A COMMISSION ON THE MASS MEDIA

This proposal for a private commission to undertake a continuing appraisal of the performance of the mass media in the United States, and to make public recommendations for its improvement, is based upon these assumptions:

1. The First Amendment to the Constitution prevents official regulation or censorship of the printed press, and may extend the same immunity to the program content of broadcasting despite the licensing authority of the Federal Communications Commission.

2. By tradition the media are left largely to private ownership, and presently must earn their own way or be maintained by private subsidy.

3. Despite their private character, the media are expected to perform the vital function of disseminating information and providing the independent advocacy in public affairs deemed essential in a democratic society.

4. In addition to this direct relationship to the conduct of government, the media are major instruments of mass culture.

5. In areas clearly involving the public interest the media are presently deficient. The flow of unbiased information concerning public affairs is not adequate; the trend is away from diversity in the advocacy of public issues; legitimate cultural demands of important segments of the national community are unmet and the general level of present offerings may be debasing public taste.

THE NEED

The condition of the mass media is a matter of concern to many thoughtful citizens, not only in terms of the evident malfunction of some of our democratic institutions, but of the unfulfilled cultural promise of the new technology.

This has led to suggestions from responsible persons for radical departure from the present laissez faire relationship between government and the media. There is not, apparently, any constitutional bar to the creation of a public broadcasting system, the publication of a government newspaper, or the extension of direct subsidy to media which meet certain standards set by a public authority. In the absence of court precedent, there are constitutional scholars who contend that broadcasters, who operate in protected monopoly status by virtue of a government grant of space in the limited frequency spectrum, are not in fact covered by the First Amendment and could be totally regulated in the name of "public INTEREST convenience and necessity." And the people could, if they ever so chose, repeal or amend the First Amendment.

Proposals of this sort, although seriously made, so far have not been seriously received. They run counter to deep-seated tradition. The founders believed that the press must be private if it were to be free. This concept has survived technological and economic developments that have altered the basic character of the communications industry and have been instrumental in reshaping American society: mass circulation newspapers and magazines; local monopoly and chain publishing; motion pictures providing huge national audiences for drama and entertainment; reliance on only two agencies to collect and edit the great bulk of the national and international news available to most Americans; a broadcasting system for words and pictures which centers control of most programming in three large corporations.

The media have a vested economic interest in immunity from government regulation, and the means by which to effectively propagandize in support of the tradition which sustains it. But there are also disinterested arguments in favor of the present system. In their total range, the communications media in the United States may very well be the best that mankind has produced. The absence of government regulation, and the limitations of tradition on private censorship, unquestionably have contributed to the flourishing of art in books, the theatre, the quality magazines, the concert stage, recordings, and, to some extent, motion pictures. Minority and unorthodox views are effectively voiced, although usually only to the limited audiences reached by media which function with no, or only secondary reliance on advertising revenue. The difficulty is that these benefits of freedom carry over in only desultory fashion to the mass media which serve the great majority of Americans.

In their single-minded concentration on maintaining immunity to government regulation, the media have largely lost effective capacity for the kind of self-examination that might lead to consideration of other pressures which have eroded their freedom of action and limited their ability to meet their public responsibility. To admit the deficiencies cited above is to invite further attack, hence they are rationalized in the name of liberty.

This tendency is accentuated by the economics of the communications marketplace. Genuine prosperity in publishing or broadcasting, and in many cases even survival, requires subordination of public service obligations to the purely commercial demands of the customers, or a combination of dedication and extraordinary skill on the part of proprietors and managers that is becoming increasingly rare. The problem here is only incidentally that of the use of economic pressure to shape positions on public matters. Rather it is the legitimate demand of advertisers for exposure to the largest possible body of potential purchasers in return for the revenue upon which the media must depend. A distinguished network television program is by definition expensive; it may please millions of Americans and still fall far short of attracting a marketable audience. A newspaper which takes an unpopular stand on a public issue may suffer a loss of readers which will be translated into a critical loss of advertising income. These economic limits may be misjudged by the unduly cautious, or used as an excuse by the expedient, but they are nevertheless real.

Yet all of us are largely, and most of us are totally dependent upon the mass media for our view of a world caught up in political and technological revolution. So, too, we must place major reliance upon these media for effective criticism of our political, social and economic institutions. But, in popular terms, no one criticises the critic. The few authoritative voices raised within the industry and without are drowned out by a chorus of apologists who have at their disposal the great megaphone of the media they serve. The universities, having permitted their journalism schools to develop as service institutions for the communications industry, make no effective contribution in this regard. Criticism by politicians and interest groups is peripheral and properly discounted; that of self-appointed spokesmen for the frustrated intellectual minority is usually uninformed and often petulant.

THE PURPOSE

The Commission here proposed would move into a void. Its first obligation would be to put the assumptions listed above to the test of disinterested but professionally competent scrutiny of the current performance of the media. A determination of the kind and degree of existing deficiencies, in terms of the public interest, would lead to consideration of these questions:

Do the media have inherent but so far unrealized capacity to meet these deficiencies within the present system of protected private control and presumed public responsibility?

If so, what are the means for bringing about the necessary changes in procedure and organization?

If not, how can the alternative of direct or indirect intervention by government be accomplished without undue hazard to our free institutions?

The questions are not new, nor are they unique to the American experience. They are constantly raised in one fashion or another, and often in tones of despair, yet nowhere in this country is there an effective and sustained effort to find practical answers.

THE PROCEDURE

Such a commission could operate logically and most effectively in conjunction with a great university. Its first requirement would be the imprimatur of intellectual detachment. Its second would be a reputation for competence, which would derive not only from the demonstrated professional capacity of staff members drawn from the media, but from their active association with scholars capable of dealing with broad problems of public policy.

A certain amount of research would be required, and new methods would have to be devised. It has never been enough, for example, to simply assert, as many have, that coverage of national political campaigns is biased and otherwise inadequate -- that candidates are favored or downgraded, that issues are distorted or obscured, that the very character of politics is being reshaped and cheapened by the histrionic demands of modern communications. Such charges make no impression unless they are sustained by the kind of content analysis that goes far beyond the usual measurement of column inches in newspapers, the counting of minutes of air time, and the comparison of advertising budgets. Considerations of cause and effect may properly take into account the partisan leanings of the proprietors of the media, and the frequently opposite leanings of their correspondents and commentators, but proper weight must also be given to the non-partisan limitations of time, space, and inadequate preparation of reporters and editors for their complex task. The fetish of pseudo-scientific objectivity, which has become the hallmark of research in journalism schools, must be abandoned in favor of dispassionate subjectivity. This clearly is not within the capacity of clerks with comptometers.

But there would be no research for its own sake. The activities of the staff would be geared directly to the deliberations of the commission. And the commission would be concerned with finding practical answers to the broad questions of public policy cited above, and those that undoubtedly would evolve as the work progressed.

THE ORGANIZATION

The commission would face a unique problem of public relations. It would be cast in the role of critic of those agencies which control the means by which public opinion is ordinarily formed. It could expect the support of a responsible and influential minority of the media, but it should anticipate the condemnation of the majority, which react automatically in defensive reflex to any suggestion that the industry is not adequately meeting its responsibilities. The commission, therefore, would have to be armed with great prestige. To be heard, it would have to speak in a voice that could not be ignored.

A basic requirement for membership on the commission would be a meaningful name. Some members should be persons known and respected by the public in their own right. Others might be of more limited general reputation, provided they possess qualifications which would establish their authority in terms impressive to the media. Care would have to be given to obtaining reasonable balance between those who might be identified in today's uncertain terms as liberal or conservative, or those actively identified with the two political parties. Those with past or present connections with the media would have to enjoy acknowledged rank as elder statesmen to offset the suspicion that their view was colored rather than informed by their special interest. Open-mindedness and genuine concern with the matters at hand is, of course, assumed in all cases.

It seems likely that the best prospects would come from three general categories: public men of long experience with the practical results of the media's deficiencies; scholars with a special interest in communications; and persons who have earned sound reputations in the media or in directly related fields, such as advertising. A sufficient balance to insure against domination by persons in any one category would be desirable.

These requirements severely restrict the choice of commissioners, so much so that the size of the body might practically be limited to nine, or even seven. It would, in any event, be a working group, prepared to assume full responsibility for the reports issued in its name. Consideration should be given to providing reasonable compensation for the members.

The commission would be supported by a small permanent staff, and would also employ the services of specialists brought in on a consultant basis. The director and his principal associate should be professionals of demonstrated capacity drawn from the media; if the senior man were from television his first assistant should be from the printed media. The remainder of the staff and the consultants would be composed of academics and professional communicators in a mixture to be determined by the requirements of specific programs devised or approved by the commission.

The commission should operate independently of the normal administration of the university, drawing upon its own financial resources, and setting its own salary scales in terms of its own special requirements.

However, close coordination at the policy level should be achieved by appointment of the president of the university to the Commission, possibly as chairman.

THE PRODUCT

The commission would place major reliance upon an annual report. This would be a major document summarizing its findings, and setting forth appropriate recommendations for private or public action. It might be supported by more detailed separate volumes if appropriate.

Experience might demonstrate the desirability of additional publications in the form of interim reports on matters of immediate interest, or possibly the publication of a quarterly.

It could be anticipated that members of the commission and its staff would be called upon frequently to speak before important professional and lay groups concerned with the problems of communications. Most importantly, the commission would be expected to play a major role in the determination of key policies in broadcasting now pending before the FCC and the committees of Congress. Presently and urgently at issue are:

The desirability and feasibility of tighter regulation of broadcasters by FCC in such matters as requirements for public service programming, the relationship of advertisers to program content, and the frequency and character of commercials.

The determination of FCC policy in regard to subscription television, and the coming development of broadcasting financed in whole or in part directly by the viewer as a possible means of filling the cultural void that now deprives the minority viewer.

The proposal by Walter Lippmann and others that the government establish and subsidize a high-quality cultural and informational broadcasting service after the fashion of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The languishing experiment in educational TV, which has suffered from financial malnutrition to the extent that it has never yet been put to proper test as an offset to the rampant commercialism of conventional TV.

The question of shifting all TV broadcasting from the VHF to the UHF spectrum, thereby more than tripling the available broadcast channels and obtaining greater potential diversity at the expense of adapting hundreds of transmitters and millions of receiving sets.

All of these matters are destined to be settled ~~soon~~ IN THE YEARS IMMEDIATELY AHEAD, one way or another. The decisions taken could well shape the future of broadcasting. They presently are being considered in an atmosphere of public confusion, political pressure, and special interest logrolling, the whole surmounted by a massive propaganda campaign by the media directed against any effort to alter the status quo in any way that remotely threatens the present near-monopoly economic base of broadcasting.

A commission armed with the prestige visualized in this proposal would be heard in Washington and elsewhere if it were in position to speak out with authority. It could set rational terms for a continuing debate that now threatens to become meaningless. It could provide a rallying point for groups and individuals across the country who are deeply concerned and largely ignored by those who make broadcasting policy. And the commission could bolster the efforts of dedicated men and women at all levels within the industry who are trying against odds to bring bold imagination and creative spirit to the new medium.

THE BYPRODUCT

The annual report and related offerings by the Commission would constitute its primary activity. As indicated above, circumstances might require its initial concentration on the problems of broadcasting. However its concern would be with the entire range of communications -- with what is reaching and not reaching the mass audience, rather than with the changing means of transmission.

Thus the commission would logically extend its interest to the field of education and journalism. Many and perhaps most scholars and professional journalists seriously question the curricula and teaching and research methods developed by the existing journalism schools. Many operate in a trade school atmosphere, and most are blighted by a narrow concentration on techniques.

All but an exceptional few spread their effort over only tenuously related fields, producing advertising technicians and public relations functionaries along with those who are destined to be writers and editors. In their quest for academic standing the teachers of journalism seem to be creating a pseudo-discipline out of an impossible blend of scholarship and practicality; the result is that they exercise no real influence in either the academic community or the media.

Since the performance of the media is dependent upon the capacity and inspiration of the men and women who serve them, education for journalism is a proper matter of concern for the commission. It might usefully undertake a comprehensive survey of present practices as the basis for a critical report. And, in conjunction with its host university, it should give serious consideration to the possibility of a pilot project in education of an entirely new kind, to be conducted at the graduate level in association with the work of its staff and consultants.

THE BUDGET

No attempt has been made to prepare a detailed budget for an operation whose final design must be determined by the commission. However, rough estimates of salary levels that would be required for a competent and distinguished full-time staff, payments to consultants, overhead expenses of the university, travel and other incidental expenses, and the cost of publication and dissemination of annual and other reports indicate a minimum-maximum range of $250,000 - $500,000 a year.

The commission should be conceived as permanent, and in no case should it be established unless sufficient funds were available to guarantee it a minimum tenure of five years.

The William Benton Foundation has financed the preliminary studies and conferences which underlie this proposal, and it is anticipated that the Foundation would contribute to support of the commission if it could be established under the terms set forth here. There have been other tentative expressions of interest from individuals connected with the media. It is believed that some of the large, conventional foundations might lend or make substantial grants, at least to the educational phase of the operation. Exploration of these and other possibilities is continuing.

TELEVISION - A PRESCRIPTION

Address by William Benton at 25th Anniversary Celebration of Syracuse University School of Journalism

I am proud of this award - and I am happy to come here to accept it - though I am not at all clear why I deserve it. Did your committee perhaps get wind of my addiction to memo-writing? I have just returned from two months in South America with Governor Stevenson, and my office reports that I sent back 10,000 words of Soundscriber dictation a day. My six secretaries tell me they look forward to receiving 150 pages of inter-office memoranda a week - 150 pages - on a slow week that is! - dictated from whatever place on the globe I happen to be. They refer to this output as "flying discs". Does this conceivably come under the heading of mass communications? I would hardly expect a medal for it - and certainly not from my staff.

I am indeed deeply touched by the honor you have paid me and I am pleased especially that I join Mr. Dapping on your roster. The best of our journalists grow in wisdom with the decades - as he has done. I confess that I am less impressed with his Pulitzer prize than I am with the fact that for many years he was the only Democrat among all the editors in upstate New York. Was this courage? - or was it merely wisdom? Or has he lived in the wrong part of the country?

First, I esteem highly the source from whence this award comes. I am addicted to universities, just as I am to memo-writing. I was a campus brat at the University of Minnesota, where my father was a professor. After a period of non-learning at Yale I became the black sheep of the family when I went into advertising. I still remember my mother's wail, "Billie, if you won't do something respectable, won't you at least be a lawyer?" But I partially atoned in my thirties and early forties by spending eight years as a half-time vice president of the University of Chicago. And now, as a reward for my sins, I am a trustee of three universities and one college.

Second, I value above all others this field of ours - to which your School of Journalism is dedicated - the field of human communications. To be honored for service in this area is honor indeed. In these critical days, what is more vital to the welfare, indeed the very existence of our democracy, than a system of intelligent, responsible and resourceful dissemination of news and information? And this School of Journalism, with its projected new Communications Center, now embarks on its next 25 years with renewed promise of exciting achievement. I pause to pay tribute to my friend Mr. Samuel Newhouse, your great new benefactor.

There is one medium of mass communications very much in the public eye these days - and I mean that both ways. I refer, of course, to television, the baby in our midst which has grown to be a giant - some think of it as a teen-age Frankenstein - in a little more than a decade.

Television has been having its growing pains in public these past few months. Most of the admitted pains appear to be in a region of its anatomy where it has been kicked swiftly and repeatedly by investigating Congressmen.

But make no mistake, television has towering significance for all of us - far transcending quiz shows and payola - and because this is so, I shall devote my remarks this evening to it. Further, I like to hope we can do something about it - which is more than I can say for Mr. Newhouse's papers. I like to talk about things about which something can be done.

At this very moment, that little screen, with its dancing images, is being watched in more than half of all American homes. Surveys show that on this evening - Sunday - at this hour - between 60 and 70,000,000 men, women and children are looking at and listening to television - and presumably soaking in something of what is being beamed into their homes - at least, the advertisers hope so.

Yet can we begin by agreeing that TV is in trouble? And it isn't television which is in the deepest trouble. It is we who are. It's a reasonable assumption that the networks aren't exactly beside themselves with joy today, even as they sweep the recent F.C.C. investigation under the rug of forgetfulness. But the fact remains that the American public and the nation itself are being hurt far more profoundly than the broadcasters. The harm that can come to our country and its people from misuse or, if you will permit me, un-use of the television medium is beyond calculating. Perhaps we have become so accustomed to great scientific advances that we have lost perspective on the truly mighty force that television actually is, and can be.

In a little more than a dozen years the home screen has changed our way of life. The Nielsen Television Index reports that TV is watched an average of five hours and 29 minutes per home a day. That's a lot of watching. Indeed, it's a lot of time to be doing anything. (I fear it's even more time than is given to the Encyclopaedia Britannica or Britannica's Great Books of the Western World!) Our daily living patterns have been altered by TV. Even the publishing industry has been profoundly affected. Revolutionary changes have been wrought in our speech and tastes as well as our buying habits.

Yes, it is clear that television could be the greatest force ever known to deepen our understanding and broaden our knowledge.

Is this goal realizable? How far has TV taken us toward it?

To its credit, television has given the American people some programs of considerable quality. It has given us "Omnibus", "See It Now" and other Murrow broadcasts, as well as fascinating documentaries that explore the meaning of the world in which we live. It has given us great music of the master composers, interpreted by the finest musicians of our time. It gives us the art of great actors, the wit and perception of dramatists from Shakespeare to Shaw - and the talent of enormously skilled popular performers.

Let us not deny this. Neither let us deny that, as an entertainment medium bringing diversion to tremendous masses of people, television is unsurpassed. Entertainment has a place in TV and certainly no minor one. No thoughtful observer would dream of suggesting otherwise.

Nonetheless, it is also true that the thought-inducing programs that television beams into our homes are too few. Too few, too late - or too early. One finds them clustered together in what Ed Murrow described as "the ghetto of Sunday afternoon". One finds them widely spaced throughout the week - very widely spaced - if one can find them.

Westerns and crime shows and, yes, even quiz programs, have their place as entertainment. Perhaps, as a book publisher, I can compare them with the books of fiction which crowd the advertising pages of the literary supplements. But popular novels don't have a stranglehold on the entire publishing industry. For every work of fiction published in the United States, four works of non-fiction roll off the presses. Further, radio to the contrary notwithstanding, in the field of music we Americans haven't wholly surrendered to dance tunes or rock 'n roll.

Why then have we abandoned television almost exclusively to escapist entertainment? Why should all networks and stations simultaneously be offering roughly similar fare, thus depriving the viewer of a real choice? I approve of Life magazine and the Saturday Evening Post - for those who like them! - but is there no room for U.S. News and even for Harper's and Foreign Affairs?

One of the reddest herrings drawn across the current debate is the broadcasters' argument, "We give the people what they want". Now it is certainly true that quick and ingenious ways have been found to measure the audience for any given program. Millions of dollars may ride on a single rating point. But should such ratings be taken as proof of the fact that the people want only this? By this standard the United States would never have developed any libraries or universities.

Some of the apologists for our present television system even call this rating system "cultural democracy". Why should minorities clutter up the people's media, they ask? Let them read good books, or tune in at dawn on "Sunrise Semester." (I hasten to add that I am for both prescriptions!)

I wish the apologists would ask themselves whether this is the same people who - with high purpose and self-discipline - created the most extensive educational system in history. Do the TV rating systems give us any clue to those self-denying qualities in the American character which carried our country successfully through a series of wars and which today lead us to draft our sons in the armed forces and each year to vote billions for foreign aid?

Do the TV rating systems mean that the American people would rather watch horse operas than build peace? Would they rather watch mysteries than educate their children? Are they more interested in comedians than they are in freedom and justice? Do they indeed demand the 27 westerns and 20 crime shows which are today the weekly opiate administered by the networks? I deem not. The pressures for enrollment at our universities proves not; so indeed does the sale of my books!

I have deliberately put these alternatives in a stark, unreal and extreme form. My reason is that the so-called American system of broadcasting has so far given a stark, unreal and extreme "yes" as its answer to such questions. I don't actually expect Coca Cola to undertake the responsibility for our national defense, or Elizabeth Arden to underwrite our educational system. But I do expect - and I think the American people should expect - that the greatest single instrument of human communications ever developed must be persuaded to make its due contribution to human security and human advancement.

When the American people are given vigorous leadership, and presented with clear alternatives, they can rise to a challenge. They will not knowingly seek to escape their duty or their destiny. There is a high common denominator in our people as well as a low one - and among the same men, women and youngsters. Television has taken the low road, and ignored the high.

There are times - and these times beat upon us each and every day - when the character of a broadcast may be more important than the quantity of its audience. There are days and years and epochs when it is more vital to reach substantial audiences with important programs than it is to reach far larger audiences with programs that merely amuse, bemuse or beguile. The British understand this. This is why the BBC underwrites its famous "third program".

And what do I mean by "important" and by "vital"? One great test of what is important, of what is vital, is the contribution to the survival of our society - and to our society's growth and freedom. Another test is the contribution to the cultural development of our society - to our understanding of our great heritage - our knowledge of how best to use, for our own personal development, the leisure which is increasingly ours.

In the past few months, a number of TV solutions have been offered, some by the networks themselves. Will any of these do the job? Let us see.

Suppose we try outlawing canned laughter and similar assorted production tricks. Let us do away with these stunts entirely - or use them and announce to our viewers that "audience reactions have been technically augmented." Will this do the job?

Suppose we try hiring G-men to police quiz shows. Or let's get more drastic and abolish them altogether. Will this do the job of making television a truly effective means to the survival of our society?

Or suppose we insist that advertisers put real whipped cream on their cakes instead of shaving cream. And suppose we take every precaution to insure that the race between these rival analgesics through the human viscera is not fixed. Would this do the job?

Even if we do all these things, and make plugs and payola misdemeanors in the bargain, escapist television will go on as usual. Suppose we encourage the TV industry itself to undertake a program of reform, by an industry committee, by czar or any other way. Can we really expect the present television system to change its nature? One perceptive editor pointed out that expecting the networks to regulate themselves would be like putting a baby atop Mt. Everest and cautioning the weather up there to care for it gently.

Suppose, finally, that we adopt the recommendations of the investigators of the Congress. The Committee on Legislative Oversight, following its hearings, suggested that four points be embodied in reform legislation. That networks as well as stations be licensed. That broadcasting of deceptive materials be made a crime. That secret payments such as plugs and payola be banned by law. And that the Federal Communications Commission be empowered to suspend licenses for a brief period.

At best, this is modest reform legislation. If enacted, it will do a modest amount of good. The strongest weapon is the last - if the President will appoint F.C.C. Commissioners with the backbone to use it. Up to now, the F.C.C. could only revoke licenses - something it has never done, on the seemingly plausible argument that you do not execute people for committing burglary. This new recommendation makes the punishment conform more closely to the crime. Since it involves the threat of economic sanctions for a limited time, it could well have a salutary effect.

But it is scarcely the answer. It keeps the responsibility for regulating the broadcasting industry in the hands of an agency which doesn't think responsibility for the quality of programming fits into its legislative mandate of "the public interest, convenience and necessity." I'm not too unsympathetic here. The F.C.C. Commissioners, like other politicians, don't seek headlong controversy with the press or any media of communication. They have been pushed around by the powerful broadcasting lobby, and so obviously that it is almost embarrassing to read about it. They have grown afraid of their own shadow - even in the dark - in a cellar.

Before Mr. Doerfer's sudden resignation, under pressure last month, the columnist Murray Kempton wrote, "If John C. Doerfer did not exist the broadcasting industry would have to invent him."

In view of its history of inaction and in view of our knowledge of how the Washington hierarchy works, the suggestion that the F.C.C. will act firmly can hardly be taken seriously. How effective can the F.C.C. be - as a leader - when the record shows that F.C.C. Commissioners, on leaving government service, do not fade away? Far more regularly than the generals and admirals pass into defense industries, they go to work for the broadcasting industry. (The truth is I don't have any hope for the F.C.C., at a high level, even under a Democratic administration!)

Now if the suggestions that have recently been advanced will not do the job, what will?

I have a constructive measure to review with you tonight. I deem this potentially to be a giant step forward that can take us out of our present TV morass and place us on the right path. It is my U.S. substitute for the tried and true British system - the so-called Royal Commission.

I urge that we now and at once create a National Citizens Advisory Board for Radio and Television.

The President of the United States can appoint such a Board composed of distinguished private citizens, drawn from the fields of education and communications and from leaders in the civic, cultural and religious life of the nation.

This Board should be instructed to foster a national policy on broadcasting which best serves the interests of the American public. It should advocate its policy in an annual report.

What will this Board be like and what, exactly, will it do?

It should be a permanent organization, its eye fixed unwaveringly on broadcasting. After all, these wave lengths which now sell for ten and 20 million dollars, the best of them, were originally the property of the American people and it isn't illogical for us to want to keep an eye on them. Thus I distinguish sharply between Mr. Newhouse's newspapers, his to watch and guard - with an occassional assist, I hope, from your School of Journalism - and his TV stations which were originally ours.

My proposed commission should have a staff and officers to help it function. However, it should have no power except to issue a report every year for the guidance of the President, the Congress, the F.C.C. and the American people. Thus it is to be strictly an investigative and educational body.

To be effective, the Board must be divorced from the owners and managers of broadcasting. It must be able to weigh with open mind what needs to be done in the public interest.

The Board's annual report might choose to point up the industry's successes and failures. It could suggest appropriate legislation to Congress to correct faults and abuses.

Because it would be advisory only, the charge of censorship could never be raised. It would in no way duplicate the function of the F.C.C. in granting, withholding or revoking licenses to operate stations.

The influence of this Board for good programming - and good television! - could be enormous. Why? Because it could become the television viewer's own powerful concerted voice - a voice that is actually seldom heard by the broadcasters, except as the audience singly and one by one, tune their sets on, off and around.

Such a Presidential Board can represent a new and different kind of rating system. It won't be a Trendex - it will be something even more effective, a Publex. Through its annual reports which will provide dispassionate critiques, observations and recommendations, this voice can help resolve some of the thorny problems now besetting TV and the country. Even the scores of Congressmen who own financial interests in radio and TV stations - will listen to it.

Among other things it could address itself to the tragic plight of the educational TV stations which have been dwarfed and stunted by the regulations under which they operate. These stations are now allowed neither to take sponsors or to use subscription, or pay-TV, techniques. Thus they are deprived of dependable sources of revenue. They are not allowed to operate under private ownership, even in part, even if they were able to tempt private owners. Thus they are deprived of top management. The plight of educational TV is dismal indeed, and of course warrants a whole speech - or volume of speeches - by itself. Can you imagine a system which fails to allocate a VHF channel for education to New York City - or to my state of Connecticut? Yes, educational TV needs an infusion of new strength to insure its survival. A Presidential Board could face up to this monumentally important task.

My proposed Board would, of course, tackle the problem of what I call one-note television, the entertainment note.

Right now, a course in chemistry is being taught every weekday morning to what may well be the largest "class" in the history of American education. An estimated 500,000 high school teachers, school and college students, engineers, housewives and others to whom education represents a continuing process rise at dawn to attend television classes conducted by Professor John F. Baxter.

Last year, Professor Harvey Elliott White of the University of California also attracted hundreds of thousands to his remarkable TV physics course - also at dawn.

These two courses we owe to the Ford Foundation which has been singularly and remarkably generous in the support of educational TV - unique among the great foundations - but singularly and remarkably quiescent about the ills which beset TV.

The fact that so many Americans of all ages and occupations are willing, even anxious, to rise at daybreak and attend TV classes presided over by non-celebrities is highly revealing. Drs. White and Baxter have attracted so many people because they teach what so many want to know. Presumptively, a few more would want to know - if the professors were available on educational TV at 6:30 P.M. instead of 6:30 A.M.

If you were to tell the American people that they could broaden their own knowledge and offer a reasonable substitute for a college education for their children by the right use of the marvellous new instrument of TV, don't you suppose entertainment would once in a while - and I mean once in a prime-time while - take a back seat?

A week ago Wednesday Broadcasting Magazine took a full page advertisement in The New York Times. "At this moment", the ad began, "television and radio are in urgent need of help ... they need wise administration from within and wise guidance from without. They have not had enough of either, but right now wise guidance from without is in especially short supply."

I could not agree more. Broadcasting Magazine deplores the prevalent non-constructive abuse and vilification of broadcasting. And here again I agree. Most of it is beside the point.

But the point is a much more profound one than "Broadcasting" recognizes. The magazine lists what it calls "undesirable conditions" in broadcasting, four in number - misleading advertising, payola, rigging of quiz shows and improper influence on the F.C.C.

A few days before General David Sarnoff, the head of RCA and NBC, was quoted as saying, "I find it remarkable that television has made as few serious errors as it has and that the errors, serious as they were, have not been irretrievable."

When General Sarnoff speaks of errors, and Broadcasting Magazine lists "undesirable conditions", neither is talking to the central point. The central point is not television's malpractices. It is television's great sin of omission - its failure in education and public enlightenment. Here is where a new, high level of statesmanship must enter. Here is the point on which Broadcasting Magazine's "wise guidance from without" must concentrate. I am proposing here tonight that a National Citizens Advisory Board, properly constituted, could provide the statesmanship, the "wise guidance from without."

May I conclude by saying that the suggestion for a Presidential Board such as I have described is not a sudden stop-gap solution dreamed up as a result of the current revelations. It is a carefully thought-out proposal, the work of men of broad experience in communications. Back in 1951, a resolution calling for the establishment of such a board was submitted to the Senate by four Senators - John W. Bricker of Ohio, Leverett Saltonstall of Massachusetts, the late Lester C. Hunt of Wyoming, and by me.

Three days of hearings were held in September of that year before a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Many representatives of the country's most renowned cultural organizations appeared in favor of the proposal. The resolution, however, was tabled and never revived.

I am reviving this proposal now - here in this academic gathering - because we have once more seen - dramatically - that television requires, above all else, a new conception of its role. I deem this a suitable area of interest for a School of Journalism devoted to the improvement of the mass media.

By law, television is constituted to operate in the public interest, convenience and necessity. It needs a conscience to help it do so. The Presidential Board can be exactly that. It also needs intellectual guidance. And this our great universities can help provide.

Dear Ed:

I agree with your comment on the front page of the Sunday morning's "Times". Perhaps the attached will be the first news that you have had that you were on the front page! I arrived in London at 4 o'clock Monday morning. I am at Claridges. I have a busy jammed week with my Britannica engagements. Geoffrey Crowther is resigning as Chairman of our British Board and I had to come over to elect myself and to give some luncheons and dinners. - Geoffrey is staying on both the British and American Boards and his relations with the Company remain unimpaired, but he does not want so much responsibility -

Will you give me a ring and tell me your plans? Could you have dinner with me one night? Will you be here over the weekend? I have no plans for my evenings from Thursday to Monday. However, they are likely to fill up fast.

If the evening doesn't suit you, let's make it late one afternoon.

I thought I might give Eric Seveareid a ring while I'm here, but I want to visit with you privately and personally. I want to resume our conversations at our last lunch.

Dear Ed:

I am glad that you don't want to make decisions about your own future for a good while yet. I think this is best for you. When I talked to Mitch by phone just before leaving for the cruise - I was afraid that he and I had been negligent in not following through with you, after our last luncheon. I hope that you can sit down with him before you leave. I would like his views on the kind of project you outlined - and I think he would have a good bit to contribute to your own thinking. Please try to do it if you can. Otherwise, perhaps we will have to let the whole matter drift until you get back. You and I of course might be in London at the same time during the next year - though I doubt if I'll get there until May.

Adlai and I and our guests have had dinner with your friend, Eric Sevareid, and his friend, Bob Ardley, the last two nights while we were in Malaga. Further, they drove to Grenada with us. Eric seems to me to be desperately longing for his four month's scheduled rest here in Spain. Incidentally, he had a very attractive girl on his arm. And he tells me that you are kidding me or yourself - when you contend that you can put on programs of "Small World" with an investment of only five hours in each!

We wish you were here!

Dear Bill:

I have just reopened my home in Connecticut and I found waiting for me your Annual Report to Stockholders, and it reminds me that I'm wrong in not telling you when I am in the east so that you can invite me for lunch. I suppose my greatest mistake was in my failure to sell Munak to you in 1948 when my proceeds would have made me a major stockholder in C.B.S. And this, as demonstrated on pages 70 and 71 of your report, would have earned me far more money than I ever had any chance to earn from Munak.

Your report persuades me that you are one of America's greatest businessmen. There have been times when I had hoped you would be one of America's greatest educators and public leaders. Should I indeed abandon you on the latter, and only cling to you on the former?

I know you and I agree that television is the greatest unrealized educational opportunity in history.

Would you object if the educational TV stations were given permission, by the FCC, to use subscription TV techniques? Would you object if they were allowed to ask a fee for their services? I am mindful of your section in your report, "Pay Television." Would you object to it if it abandoned all forms of entertainment broadcasting and confined itself to education?

Dear Ed:

My wife and I sat enthralled on Tuesday afternoon and watched your Montgomery film. This is the third of your great films which I have personally seen, but the other two came to me from my projector. It's the first time I've ever sat at a TV screen for an hour in my life. I only remember once before for even half an hour.

The Montgomery interview was magnificent. Here's how TV can be used, dramatized by you in one great and inspired hour. My faith in the medium, used up to its potential, needs no refurbishing. If it did, you would have given it to me. I know its potential from my constant and intense application to Britannica Films, and from my long background in radio.

You are on the front page of the Phoenix papers in a two-page story this morning, and the story doesn't remotely do justice to the film. You are used to that. But I am happy to see that this is your last major TV ordeal - before leaving for what the paper refers to as your sabbatical.

My secretary right now is trying to arrange a session so that Bob Hutchins and I can catch up with you before we scatter.

Sincerely,

Bill

Dear Ed and Janet;

I am sending you a new book. I hope you can find time to read it because I think you will enjoy it. It is an advance copy of "The Great EB: The Story of Encyclopaedia Britannica." It is written by Herman Kogan, dramatic critic of the Chicago Sun-Times, who is distinguished for such successful books as "Big Bill of Chicago"; "Lords of the Levee"; "Bet a Million: The Story of John W. Gates"; and "Give the Lady What She Wants." It is to be published by the University of Chicago Press and will be released officially on May 27th.

"The Great EB" tells a fascinating story of business and of the intellectual development of the west since Britannica's launching by a "Society of Gentlemen" in Edinburgh 190 years ago. I am especially partial to the adventures of the two enterprising American book salesmen, the Messrs. Hooper and Jackson, who took over control of the Britannica in London at the turn of the century, and who later played a decisive role in the history of the London Times. It was Mr. Hooper who worked out the agreement under which the famous eleventh edition, published in 1909, carried the imprimatur and seal of Cambridge University.

The section dealing with World War II and subsequent years, which tells of my own and the University of Chicago's association with Britannica, begins on page 245. This story of Britannica's fifteen-fold growth in fifteen years may be of special interest to you.

Sincerely,

Dear Ed:

You will recall my great interest in our so-called "informational" program overseas, or in more definite terms, our propoganda policy vis-a-vis the Russians. I think you may be interested in my testimony attached, scheduled for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Monday morning. If you get a chance, I'd appreciate your views. I think you will admit that I only send you material that I really think may interest you - and this is the first in a long time.

U. S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

Background Comments

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Committee on these hearings which could not be more timely. I hope they will help the American people to regain perspective. When the Sputniks went up, the missile experts of our army, navy and air corps suddenly seemed as valuable as the Minute Men at Concord and Lexington, as indispensable as Britain's fighter pilots after the fall of France.

But the fact remains that the primary threat to America and the free world is far more than military. Mr. Khruschchev has repeatedly challenged us to a duel to the death - a duel between his system and ours - a contest not of arms but of economics, diplomacy and ideology. He seems sure he can win without using the missiles.

Senator Green has invited me to testify on the psychological aspects of this duel and indeed the impact of the sputniks is primarily psychological. I shall concentrate largely on the Iron Curtain, and I shall make some proposals for knifing through it.

However, I deeply appreciate the great issues with which this Committee is wrestling. A deep chasm today divides the U. S. from the USSR on such questions as German unification, the Eastern European satellites, outer space, the so-called Rapacki Plan, world trade, etc., etc. When I served as Assistant Secretary of State under Secretaries Byrnes and Marshall, I used to comment that all problems of foreign policy could be summarized in four one-syllable words: force, goods, deeds and words. Today I shall deal only with words, and with deeds as they are designed to create words. Or, to put it more bluntly, I shall present to the Committee a few of my thoughts on the subject of propaganda.

I happen to think that the conduct of American foreign policy is not only studded with failures in our diplomacy which your Committee proposes to examine; with failures in our military policy as exemplified by the Sputniks; with mistakes in our foreign trade policy going back at least a full generation; but over and above these three areas which are widely discussed and debated, our foreign policy has been studded with failures and blunders in the field of propaganda, and these go back the full quarter century or more since propaganda became a recognized tool of a nation's overseas activity.

In 1935, when the then Prince of Wales dedicated a building in London to the British Council, he commented that Great Britain was the last of the great nations of the world to recognize the importance of cultural relations in the conduct of foreign policy. The United States officially first took note of this importance with the appointment of Nelson Rockefeller as co-ordinator of inter-American affairs in 1940. I was one of the three top consultants appointed by Mr. Rockefeller when he took office. Thus my interest in this field goes back to its very inception in U. S. policy. However, my major responsibilities in it developed only when Secretary Byrnes and President Truman asked me to take the appointment of Assistant Secretary of State in August of 1945 when, at the end of the war, the Office of Inter-American Affairs and the OWI, the two great war agencies charged with propaganda policy, were shifted into the State Department.

The Secretary of State was instructed to come up with an overseas program which would "present a full and fair picture of American life and of the aims and policies of the United States Government." This objective became my responsibility.

When Secretary Byrnes and Senator Vandenberg returned from the Paris Conference in June of 1946, Secretary Byrnes appeared with me before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, Based on his five months' experience with the Russians in Paris, he said, "The broadcasts in Russian which in my absence Secretary Benton started from Munich, at an annual cost of only $135,000, are worth to the people of the United States the entire $20 million which he is seeking for his program of information and cultural relations." The Congress passed the appropriation as requested.

With Secretary Byrnes' resignation, and with the advent of the 80th Congress in 1947, came the bitter attack upon the new program. Indeed, it became a number one target of the Republican National Committee and of some of the great private groups in the field of communications. The bill which later became known as the Smith-Mundt Act, which I helped to write and then sponsored on behalf of the State Department, precipitated a debate on the floor of the House of Representatives which Senator Monroney, then a Congressman, told me was more bitter and prolonged than any bill in his ten years in the Congress. Senator Mundt reminded me only last month that the time given to this debate was 50% longer than that accorded the highly controversial Taft-Hartley Act which passed in the same session.

When I resigned from the Department in the fall of 1947, with the passage of the Smith-Mundt Act assured, and the Fulbright Act and UNESCO legislation already through the Congress, Secretary Hull told me that he regarded the validation of the program for which I had been responsible, in view of the widespread opposition both in Congress and throughout the country, as nothing short of "a miracle."

Later, when I served in the Senate, I renewed my interest in this controversial area of our foreign policy, and I hope some of the members of your Committee may recall the hearings on my resolution calling for a Marshall Plan in the field of ideas. These were conducted by a subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee chairmanned by Senator Thomas and among the witnesses were President Eisenhower, General Marshall and Secretary Dulles.

More recently, in 1955, I visited the Soviet Union and since then have written and spoken widely on the USSR's propaganda techniques.

I sketch this background to remind the Committee of my long interest in the area on which I am testifying today.

* * * * * * *

Since I left the Senate five years ago, the USIA has been ripped out of the State Department; the management and direction of the agency has suffered from frequent changes and shakeups; the ill-fated trip of Cohn and Schine and the attacks of Senator McCarthy shook the agency to its foundations; its key personnel has sought in vain for career status; and all in all, although the appropriations of the agency have increased somewhat, the USIA can only be called the sick and cast-off child of the State Department.

The handling of our propaganda has thus been isolated from policy and from the general conduct of our foreign affairs, rather than regarded as an integral part of it. Perhaps, in view of the hazards of the 12-1/2 post-war years, I should be pleased that we have made some progress - instead of complaining about our lost opportunities. However, I urge upon this Committee that it now give to this area in the conduct of our foreign policy the top attention that it deserves. One reason I deem these hearings to be of high importance is that they promise such an approach.

Importance of reaching the Russian People

Two years ago, Christian Pineau of France, present foreign minister and former premier, said: "If Communist propaganda can continue indefinitely in the West, while the West cannot spread its propaganda in Communist countries, then one day we shall all be subjugated. This is my firm conviction."

Pineau said our hope of survival rests upon the ability of the Western nations to reach the Russian people. Only when propaganda becomes a two-way street, he said, will there be an opportunity to "modify profoundly" the intransigent attitude of the Soviet regime.

The diplomats of Washington may scoff at Bulganin's letters, but those of Asia and Africa do not. Indeed, each and every one should have been answered in exhaustive detail, not for the American people but for those for whom the letters were actually intended. The primary purpose of the most recent letters, as everyone knows, was to blanket the NATO meeting in Paris and to emphasize the great, pure and peaceful aims of the Soviet Union while the Western nations were talking about armaments. The letters reached the world, but no replies to them from us reached the Russian people.

Khrushchev's world-wide success as a publicist is founded on the fact that this is a peace-hungry world. His formula seldom varies, and good Marxist dogma it is: we want peace and you want war. His current theme is "Let's get together and talk peace."

Some weeks back, he proposed a special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations to take up nuclear armaments. Time after time he has suggested another "summit" meeting. He has also hinted that, to end the present impasse, Russia and the United States should perhaps go it alone in bilateral talks.

Deeds vs Words

Khrushchev has known in advance what the free world's answers would be. They are nearly always an anguished, "NO". The world is told that we won't be taken in by Khrushchev's obvious propaganda tricks; and further that Communist Russia must prove its good intentions by deeds and not words. This last maxim has been used so often that it seems to have frozen the creative thinking of the West and indeed, in today's world is not the maxim being misapplied? Are deeds really as much more important than words as we like to think? Could it be, as Mr. Pineau suggests, that we have missed the key to Communist success, and thus helped insure our own futility?

I suspect that those of our diplomatic leaders, and these include Democrats of the last administration as well as Republicans of this - I suspect that those who keep saying, "It is the deed, not the word that counts," are doing us a great disservice. Ideally, I agree that what counts is the deed and it counts most when coupled with the word. However, the word can obscure and minimize and offset a bad deed. Furthermore, sometimes words generate desired deeds. When Khrushchev calls for a "summit" conference, isn't that his effort by the words of propaganda to create the deed he desires?

Since World War II, the United States has acted with unprecedented generosity in the conduct of its foreign affairs. It has given to friend and former foe alike. It even offered to foresake its monopoly of nuclear weapons on equitable terms. During this same time, Communist Russia has followed a policy often based upon intrigue, terror, force and the suppression of human values. Yet on the barometer of world esteem, the prestige of the Moscow government appears to be rising steadily. Ours has fallen to a new low. This hardly supports the thesis that "deeds and not words" form the only ultimate test.

Samuel Adams didn't hesitate to launch his Committee of Correspondence against the might of the British Empire. He got powerful assistance from the stirring words of Thomas Jefferson and Tom Paine. Are we not today, in our timid and fearful attitude towards propaganda, neglecting a powerful spiritual weapon of our common heritage? The Communists are not neglecting theirs. Lenin wrote in 1905 that "propaganda is of crucial importance for the triumph of the party." He knew that ideas are the weapons of propaganda. He knew well, as Lord Keynes put it, that "soon or late it is ideas, not economic interests which are dangerous for good or evil." When I served in the State Department, I watched the Communist propaganda soften up China for conquest. And China fell more to propaganda than to military might.

Last month a Gallup poll in New Delhi turned up the following percentages on its question, "Which is doing more to help peace in the world -- Russia or the West?": Russia 54%; West 18%; don't know 28%. Note the ratio: 3 to 1 for Russia.

The same poll asked citizens of 12 world capitals, "Who is ahead in the 'cold war', Russia or the West?" Russia was rated ahead in 10 capitals - in some cases by four or five to one among those who gave definite answers - and the West in only two - and, please note this, one of the two was New Delhi.

USSR Calls the Rules

I believe that after investigation your Committee will conclude that the USSR is shellacking us with its propaganda. Further, I think you will discover that the U. S. has foolishly allowed Russia to call the rules of the propaganda game.

Now there is no law of international comity which suggests that certain nations shall have an exclusive privilege of defaming the good names of others throughout large areas of the world. This of course is possible only because of the complete veto power of the Communist countries over news and information from the West. Because of this, the Iron Curtain can nullify our attempts to reach an agreement for the easing of international tensions.

There is, of course, irony in the fact that a ruthless dictatorship may use the tools of freedom to win a supreme psychological advantage over nations which cherish these tools as the touchstone of their culture. And there is further irony in the fact that Khrushchev, who wields this psychological whip, heads a government which is deeply troubled by the urge for freedom and liberty now running among its own subjects.

I suggest that it's time the free nations got up off the psychoanalyst's couch and started hitting the Soviet Union psychologically at its weakest point. That point is the Iron Curtain which blocks its people from exposure to the developing world around them.

For too many years, the West has accepted the delusion that the iron Curtain is invincible. That view is a most pernicious outcropping of a Western inferiority complex.

Vulnerability of USSR

The Soviet Government is vulnerable because it has consistently deceived its own people. If we can get through to the Russian people, the arrogance of the Soviet propaganda will visibly melt. If we can crack the Iron Curtain, it should be possible to create a world climate of opinion in which no nation would dare employ nuclear weapons to make war or to use its stockpile to intimidate other peoples. Essential to this climate of opinion is the attitude of the peoples within the USSR. Increasingly it seems evident that only through their understanding can worthwhile disarmament agreements evolve. Peace talks will be futile until the Russian people are brought into the world community of thought. Further, we should do all we can to bring an understanding of this to other countries throughout the world.

The first step is to shake up our psychological approach to the Soviet impasse from cellar to garret. We must ourselves announce a peace program, both bold and imaginative, and so comprehensive in its terms that its purpose and scope will snatch the peace initiative from the Soviet Union. The bedrock for such a program lies scattered over a dozen different proposals and policies over the past dozen years. The target of the program, as Mr. Pineau suggested, must be the peoples of the Communist bloc.

It is necessary to make a change of 180 degrees in the arc of our propaganda policy -- from "No" to "Yes." For example, why should not every Moscow peace proposal for a summit meeting -- why should it not be accepted with alacrity -- but with our own "if" -- upon the strict proviso that such deliberations should be made known in full to the Russian people.

In his many roles beside that of peacemaker, Mr. Khrushchev fancies himself as the leading exponent for the new people-to-people diplomacy -- that movement of broader cultural, social and scientific ties across national boundaries. This is the new diplomacy of the rocket age and Khrushchev has exploited it with his usual artistry. Does this not give us a superb opportunity to challenge him to open up the Iron Curtain? And to keep challenging him to admit publicly that he is afraid to let in the truth to the Russian people?

A race to the moon is advertised as the next contest in the scientific sweepstakes between the Communists and the free nations. It would be nice for us to win that race. It might be even nicer if we asked Mr. Khrushchev to join us in a cooperative venture by which we could reach the moon together. But in my judgment it is infinitely more important to reach the Russian people than it is to get to the moon.

Mr. Khrushchev's speech of January 22nd in Minsk, which hasn't received the attention it deserved in this country, illustrates my thesis that ideas can get through the Iron Curtain, and that the Kremlin is sensitive to the impact of ideas on its public. This was a speech intended for a local audience, and apparently spontaneous. Much of it was a belligerent reply to President Eisenhower. The status of the countries of East Euorpe is not a subject for discussion at a summit conference, Khrushchev said; the idea of a plebiscite is ridiculous. The idea prevalent in the West that the 20th Congress of the Communist Party caused or revealed division and confusion in the socialist world must be controverted. Khrushchev agreed with President Eisenhower's thesis that deeds, not words, are what count; let the U.S. display deeds by giving up the bases which ring the Soviet Union.

(I shall be happy to submit the text of Khrushchev's speech, which I do not believe has been published in the U.S.)

Has there perhaps been a subtle transition in American thinking and policy within recent weeks? If so, this is most promising. Governor Stevenson has suggested a world conclave of distinguished private citizens to explore and make recommendations for ending the deadly armaments race. President Eisenhower has suggested a meeting of humanists, gathered from across the earth, to assess the world's condition and to make suggestions for making it a better place in which to live.

Recently, and more importantly, President Eisenhower wrote a letter to Bulganin which posed positive and constructive proposals, such as the abolition of the veto in the UN, a letter which the Soviets haven't seemingly known how to answer, at least not yet.

Such ideas are positive though tentative steps which express the genuine idealism of the American people. I suggest to this Committee today that we must group these overtures and develop them into a full symphony.

How to Break the Iron Curtain

We have at hand the weapons to break the Iron Curtain. One weapon, as suggested by Khrushchev's speech in Minsk, is the worldwide moral power of the Presidency of the United States. Great Presidents like Jefferson, Lincoln, Wilson and Roosevelt never hesitated to use it and the influence they wielded stands unmatched in the temporal affairs of men. They literally shook up the world with their ideas about freedom and the essential need for human brotherhood.

Here are some further suggestions of the kind of positive things which I believe we should be doing; these are merely samples:

1. President Eisenhower might announce his desire to make a peace appeal directly to the Russian people and request the cooperation of the Soviet Government in providing the necessary press and radio facilities. A talk of this nature would be one of the most dramatic in world history. As an aid to peace it could be worth a dozen summit meetings. He could even ask for a monthly talk to the Russian people, and offer Khrushchev the same opportunity here.

2. The Soviet proposal for a special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations to discuss disarmament should be accepted -- with the strict proviso that the deliberations at this meeting shall be fully reported by the Soviet press and radio to the Russian people, as they will be to ours.

3. The Congress could adopt a resolution expressing its sense that the United Nations should take the lead in sponsoring complete freedom in the exchange of news and information between the people of the Communist countries and the people of the United States. (This was the dream of the U.S. delegation, of which I was chairman, at the UN Conference on Freedom of Information in Geneva in 1948.)

4. Some engineering experts are now convinced that a breakthrough is possible of the Soviet radio jamming. Responsible estimates put the cost to the USSR of jamming at $114,000,000 annually, more than the total budget of the USIA.

One responsible expert tells me there is a possible way to end the jamming -- not a certainty, but with perhaps an even chance of success -- and that a research expenditure of less than $1 million might produce the new technique required. I happen to think such a technique would be a bargain to the U.S. at the Soviet annual cost of $114,000,000. Our top physicists are needed on this project at least as much as for satellites.

5. The United States should tell the Russians again and again that we shall be glad to have them operate a radio station in Washington if they will permit us to operate one in Moscow. This was a proposal I made publicly twelve or more years ago when I was serving as Assistant Secretary of State.

6. The world should be told once again that if Soviet Russia will agree to a rigid system of nuclear disarmament, the United States is prepared to spend as much as ten billions annually to help the economic development of less favored nations. The savings on armaments alone would make this possible. This was a proposal of my colleague, Senator Brien McMahon.

7. Why shouldn't we ask the Soviets to take all of our students they are willing to accommodate at their universities? We need young people who speak Russian. I happen to think our students there, as evidenced by countless reports, would be great ambassadors for our way of life.

(There's of course no real hope of the Soviets agreeing to exchange two or three hundred thousand students, though the offer seems worth making. But why should we not encourage a quarter-million American students to study abroad? The "tidal wave" of American youngsters due to hit our colleges will raise the number of qualified applicants from the present three million to six million by 1970. College administrators see little or no hope of doubling their facilities. Tuition and living costs at foreign universities, even the most famous, average substantially less than private U.S. colleges and universities. Would it not contribute greatly to international understanding if 250,000 young Americans were enrolled abroad every year? This seems to me a good idea, and it's a cheap idea because it won't cost our economy any more than if we keep these students at home. Such a positive proposal would, I believe, arouse world-wide interest, particularly if coupled with a more aggressive program to bring foreign students to this country.)

8. We should at once begin the construction of vastly expanded and more powerful radio transmitters, beamed behind the Iron Curtain; and indeed we would press with more vigor every idea that holds any reasonable promise of eroding the curtain.

9. We should mobilize our science and engineering talent to devise means of obtaining compulsory access to the Soviet audience. Further, Soviet scientists want contact with ours; they don't argue about the facts of science; our scientists can become most potent ambassadors.

* * * *

There is no belligerency in proposals such as these. Indeed, they reflect the desire of the American people for lasting peace.

A talk by the President to the Russian people will capture the imagination of men everywhere if only because all mankind has a stake in the outcome of the present armaments race. Our Chief Executive could assure the frightened masses of the USSR that our democratic and spiritual background is a firm guaranty that nuclear weapons will never be used for an assault upon the Soviet Union. He can give renewed assurance that the United States and its Allies are ready now, as they have been for a decade, to enter a fair and effective pact for the banishment of nuclear weapons.

Indeed, the summit meeting, which the Kremlin is promoting and which seems increasingly imminent, could provide the perfect opening for a talk by the President to the Russian people.

Next, the moral prestige of the Congress in world affairs is great and we have neglected this potential weapon. In suggesting that the United States should assume the lead in boring a hole in the Iron Curtain, the Congress will be following the precedent it established seven years ago when it passed the McMahon-Ribicoff resolution expressing the sincere desire of the American people for lasting friendship with the people of Russia. This resolution was sponsored by two of the most eminent representatives of my state who have served in the Congress. President Truman sent it to the Soviet Government with the request that it be made known in full to the Russian people. Stalin not only gave it complete coverage by press and radio but he even said that he was willing to approve a limited exchange of news articles between Soviet and American journals. Unfortunately this chink in the Iron Curtain was never followed up. This may have been one of our mistakes.

There are members of this Committee who sponsored this friendship resolution who will be interested to know that a prominent official of our overseas information program assured me not long ago that it was one of the best good-will gestures this country ever made.

Thus I believe that an occasional Congressional resolution can do an immense amount of good and beyond this can uphold the President in his dealings with the USSR. For example, if Congress should suggest that both President Eisenhower and Mr. Khrushchev appear before the United Nations to state their views on disarmament, with full publicity in all countries, this might help us get through to the Russian people.

A Key Soviet Group: the Middle Leadership

In our efforts to penetrate the Iron Curtain, we must remember that it is necessary particularly to reach the middle leadership in the Soviet world, its new and rapidly growing class of well-schooled engineers, professional men and administrators. I reported two years ago on this expanding group to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. I think it is wise for us, in formulating policy, to share Mr. Allen Dulles' "cautious hope" that it is impossible to educate men and women to think about mathematics, physics and biology - without opening their minds to the possibility of thinking about politics and disarmament and even about justice and freedom.

The top Soviet leadership, which we identify with the Kremlin, can only agree to effective measures of arms reduction and control if the middle leadership is in favor of it. The top leadership must count upon support from the middle leadership; otherwise it will be knifed in the back by rival factions which may interpret any attempt to make a genuine agreement as a betrayal of Soviet interests.

This middle leadership is a tacit constituency that does in fact provide administrative and moral support for the top layers of the Soviet system. Its members tend to favor measures to increase the standard of living of wider and wider circles in the Soviet world. The middle leadership tends to favor measures of decentralization, and a far higher level of reward for skill. It includes the scientists and engineers, and many from the creative arts; the administrators of education, agriculture, transportation, mining, manufacturing, public health planning, construction and finance; and a segment at least of the officers' corps.

Unless the middle leadership has a steady stream of accurate information about the nature and intentions of Americans, it is left entirely to rumor and to official channels of Soviet propaganda. Its members are now cut off from access to information about us that is in fact vital to their own security. A prime objective of American policy should be to achieve direct contact with this powerful group. If wars begin in the minds of men, as stated in the UNESCO charter which I helped to frame, then hydrogen wars can only begin in hermetically sealed minds. As the London Economist states, "Truth is no longer the first casualty of war; it must be assassinated before war can be made."

However, we shall go wrong in our propaganda policy if we neglect the man at the bottom. We must pursue him too, and with every available means. I like the remark of Voltair, "History is written by the satin slippers going downstairs as the wooden shoes go up."

The U.S. - USSR Cultural Pact

Your Committee asked me to state my views on cultural pacts. The present pact with Russia seems to me to be good, even though it is in one sense a disappointment. It is good in arranging for a small scale exchange of professors and students. It is a disappointment because under its terms the Kremlin retains a complete veto power over the exchange of ideas and political talks. In that sense, the Iron Curtain remains intact.

There is a fundamental difference between what Moscow wants and knows it wants - and what we should want - and don't know we want - to accomplish by such pacts. The Kremlin wants technical information to improve its economy. We should be driving for a free flow of ideas as one great way to avoid war. We not only want the Soviet peoples to know more about us; we want to know more about them. It seems to me that we should demand that in exchange for our technical information we be granted access to the USSR. We should seek free play within the USSR for American journalists, broadcasters, sociologists, camera men, political scientists, motion picture operators, labor leaders and opinion-makers generally. We want their admittance into Russia and free movement throughout Russia for a frank review of the contrasting values of Communism and democracy and a constant check on Soviet life and progress. This is what the Soviet Union has to give us in a program of exchanges. This is what we want and what they haven't yet given. In return we are glad to welcome their engineers, technicians and specialists.

The pact states that the proposal to exchange delegations of deputies of the Supreme Soviet and Congress shall be "subject to further discussion." I hope this exchange comes off. There are some plain spoken members of this Committee I should delight to see addressing the Supreme Soviet of Russia and doing so without those inhibitions which naturally circumscribe the work of our diplomatic corps. In fact, an exchange of delegations by Congress and the Supreme Soviet could be the most fruitful exchange of all.

As part of our own efforts within the U.S., the signing of this recent pact with the Soviet Union presents another reason why we should seek to untangle our own Red-Tape Curtain, the cumbersome maze of visa, immigration and postal provisions that lead many peoples, including the Russians, to accuse us of erecting our own impenetrable barriers.

Concluding Sum-up

Summed up, the essence of my testimony is this -- let's start talking peace and then back up our words with genuine proposals big enough to meet the menace of rocket warfare. For too long, the Russians have called the rules for international debate. It's time for us to establish a few rules of our own. Lieutenant General Gavin has used that powerful phrase "Missile Blackmail" to describe the present course of the Soviet Government.

Khrushchev's success in stealing the mantle of peace is perhaps without precedent. The United States has the moral weapons to cut Khrushchev's ideas down to manageable proportions. Until that happens, the only alternative seems to be an endless armaments race or something infinitely worse.

Footnote on the USIA

I am not here to discuss the USIA. The head of USIA is at this moment opening the defense of his budget before the House Appropriations subcommittee. I will only say that the USIA budget request for fiscal 1959 -- $105 millions for operations and $5 millions for construction of radio facilities -- is far too small -- if we assume that the USIA is to be adequately lead and staffed. It is smaller than the USIA budget for fiscal 1957, and this at a moment when it is becoming dramatically clear that we are losing the psychological duel.

I would urge the immediate return of U.S. information activities to the Department of State. The USIA was removed from the Department largely on the personal desire of Secretary Dulles to be rid of it. Outside the Department, the USIA has no real voice in policy making. It can only try to pick up the pieces afterward.

USIA belongs in the State Department for many other reasons, including the coordination of its career service with the Foreign Service, and the elimination of duplicating policy staffs and duplicating research and intelligence services. But perhaps the best argument for a reunion is the continuing necessity for improving and educating and building up the State Department, which must remain the key to our overseas operations. The Department, I am told, and especially since Sputnik, has become increasingly sensitive to, and puzzled by, public opinion in foreign lands. I submit that the Department will benefit greatly by such a reunion. The USIA may suffer temporarily. But U.S. foreign relations will improve.

I recommend that, under the over-all direction of the Secretary of State and an Under Secretary, three major Divisions or Departments be created within the State Department - the Department of International Political Affairs, the Department of International Economic Affairs, and the Department of International Public Affairs. These cover three of the four major areas of foreign policy - with which I began those of "deals, goods and words" - leaving "force" to the Department of Defense. Each of the three Departments should have its own Under Secretary, or perhaps even its own Secretary as in the Defense Department. Each should have its own Assistant Secretaries. Each of the three Departments should have full line operating authority - and all officers should report up to their own Under Secretary or Secretary, who in turn would report to the Secretary of State.

Dear Bill:

Many thanks for your letters of September 17th, 19th and 27th.

I am sorry to say that Janet and I will be unable to lunch with you on Sunday, October 6th, since that is the day of the first SEE IT NOW program of the season and I must be in New York for that.

I do not know what I can do to help Patte Preble, but I will certainly talk with her, and my secretary will set up an appointment for her when she calls.

It was nice of you to write me about the TIME cover story. As for your suggestion, I would do almost anything for you, but I cannot give up cigarettes.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

I am attaching some biographical notes on an unusual young woman who has just arrived in New York after a lot of good, solid professional experience in the theatre, including six months last year as Director of Women's Programs for WICS-TV, in Springfield, Illinois, where she wrote and produced 14 shows per week which serviced 14 accounts. I've met her on many occasions because she is the daughter of Bob Preble, president of Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc. After a good many years as an actress, at age 26 she wants to continue her switch-over into writing and production. I've told her I think this is very well advised.

She seems to me to be talented, bright, good looking--and experienced. What more can be asked of a young woman of 26? I suggested she call your secretary and I hope you will instruct your secretary to tell her to whom she might best talk in her search for guidance - and in her search for a job.

Bob Preble is one of my two closest business associates and of course, I am particularly hopeful that I can be of help to his daughter Patte.

Sincerely,

Bill Benton

I have been reading your publicity and I like the picture on Time's front cover, and the story persuades me of one thing above all: you should give up cigarettes. It also persuades me that we should have more time to spend with each other.

Are you really so good with women? I rather think so, as this comes from a couple of firsthand experiences.

Excuse it, please, this is a 1933 or 1934 map.

Since then the Merritt Parkway has made transportation easier.

Coming from the West

The exit is the second exit marked "Westport." Do not go off at the Red Barn. Go off at Weston Road. Proceed to the Post Road; turn east or left, and then follow the map. The key that identifies the turn to the right on Sasco Hill Road is the Tide Mill Tavern and the bridge across the inlet (don't turn), followed by a Shell Gas Station at the corner of the road (now turn, this is Sasco Hill Road).

Coming from the East

The exit is the Black Rock Turnpike. Go around under the bridge and head toward the Post Road. Follow the road toward the Sound to the first stop light. Turn right at the first stop light where it is marked "To Fairfield"; follow this to the Post Road and then turn right on the Post Road through Fairfield to the same Shell Station on the left. Just before the Shell Gas Station on the left is a long factory - a long low red brick Exide Battery factory on the right of the road. The Shell Gas Station is on the corner of Sasco Hill Road. Turn left here.

The important thing about finding the house at the end of Sasco Hill Road with a left turn onto the private road, is to keep bearing right all the way around, past three houses on the right, and then after swinging to the right, a left back into our front yard.

Dear Ed:

If you get an easy chance, ask Mr. Mickelson to tell you about the dinner given by Bob Hutchins and his Fund for the Republic, at which the subject under discussion was TV. When I called Bob Hutchins on the morning after, he read aloud to me the paragraphs in TIME headed "Opiate of the People."

I think I'd better check up with you on where I am in this sea of television, if I happen to be anywhere, and where I may want to encourage some of my friends to go, including the Benton Foundation. I am about to leave for a couple of weeks in Europe with Paul Hoffman on behalf of the Committee for a United Europe (Bill Donovan's). I'll be back in early August and will check in with you and hope we can have lunch. When is this period when you are going to be on holiday not too far from Southport, Connecticut? We were going to have an evening together, the Murrows and the Bentons. Might this be arranged any time after my return on August 3? We'd like to have you bring your wife to Southport and spend the night with us and indeed the next day as well, and any night and any day.

The wave of editorials which followed Senator McCarthy's death, analyzing the cause and collapse of "McCarthyism", has prompted me to review some of Bill Benton's statements on the McCarthy phenomenon.

Some of Bill's friends might like to read the article I am attaching. It was written at the height of Sen. McCarthy's world-wide fame - a few months before the Army-McCarthy hearings - at the request of the editor of a London periodical, "The Fortnightly", and was published in April, 1954.

In this article Bill set out to disabuse and reassure the many Europeans who saw in McCarthy another Hitler. Bill did not then foresee that the resolution he himself had introduced in the Senate would develop into the formal basis for the Senate's vote censuring McCarthy. (Sen. McCarthy was censured for his refusal to cooperate with the committee investigating the Benton resolution.) He did give Europeans a temperate and carefully reasoned explanation of McCarthy's rise, and a prognosis of the limit of McCarthy's power.

In the course of his analysis Bill here sets forth a picture of the strength and weaknesses of the political process in America which may well have permanent value.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW, April 1954

EUROPE AND SENATOR McCARTHY

By William Benton

Former U.S. Senator and former Assistant Secretary of State.

WHEN I visited Europe in the autumn of 1951 to represent the Senate of the United States in the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg, I was astonished at the fame—and the kind of fame—Senator Joseph McCarthy seemed to enjoy on the Continent and in England. A German journalist startled me at a press conference in Bonn. "Do you think" he said, "that Senator McCarthy will be able to take over the United States?" At every press conference in Germany and Italy I was asked similar questions. Now, two years later, on another visit, I find Europe's concern with Mr. McCarthy even deeper and far more widespread. He is the most talked about American in Europe. When I was interviewed on the B.B.C. by Mr. William Clark, Diplomatic Correspondent of the London Observer, Mr. Clark remarked that the team of Cohn-and-Schine are now better known in England than were Roosevelt-and-Hopkins during the war. Adlai Stevenson tells me that Senator McCarthy's conversational primacy includes Asia as well.

Americans travelling abroad are bombarded with questions like these: "Is McCarthy another Hitler?" "Will he succeed Eisenhower as President?" "Can he stir up enough trouble to make a war?" "Can he destroy civil rights in the United States?" Europeans who think they understand the United States ask: "Has he developed a veto power over Republican policies?" "If he can't be President, can he choose the Republican nominee?" My answer to the first four questions is an unequivocal "no". The last two questions, however, probe the maximum limits of Senator McCarthy's possible strength—a balance of power rôle within his own party. If he ever attains this maximum his party, in my judgment, is doomed to defeat and destruction.

The attitude of many Europeans was summarized on November 17 by the administrative head of the World Council of Churches, Dr. W. A. Visser't Hooft, a Dutchman, who told 90 American Protestant leaders that "irresponsibility in the United States, as indicated by McCarthyism, looms as large in the Western-European mind as the threat of aggression from the East."

I have personally tried to reassure my European friends. I agree with them that many Americans under-estimate Joseph McCarthy. Many Americans cannot take him seriously; they laugh him off; they cannot believe he has any destiny except to hang himself. But by contrast I assure my European friends that they themselves greatly over-estimate him. They draw too close an analogy between what they knew as Nazi-ism or Fascism in Germany or Italy and what has become known as "McCarthyism" in America. It is an error to stretch the analogy across the Atlantic to a new setting, on another continent, and in another half of the century.

First and most important, even if Senator McCarthy had all the evil talent of Mussolini or Hitler he would still not constitute the same menace. The basic pre-conditions of Fascism and Naziism do not exist in the United States in the early '50's, as they existed in Italy in the early '20's and in Germany in the early '30's. Indeed they never have existed in the United States. America has had a long and continuous history of constitutional government, and of free speech, free debate and free elections. Measured against the power and prestige of the American Constitution and the Bill of Rights, Senator McCarthy is a pygmy.

Further, there is nothing in the American psyche comparable with the wounds the Germans felt after their defeat in the 1914-1918 war. There is nothing comparable with the resentments the Italians felt, their sense of being limited and contained, over-populated and economically depressed, underrated and undervalued. Italy and Germany were attuned to the shout of the political adventurer. By contrast, America's politics are stable. America is powerful and prosperous. It assumes its posture as a leader not to compensate for inferiority but from reluctant necessity. If it has any deep-rooted national neuroses, they are not dangerous to others. America is in no way tinder at the tyrant's hand.

I have not been able to persuade all of my European questioners that their McCarthy-Hitler analogy is invalid. They believe America is over-confident in thinking that "it can't happen here." Italians and Germans, they point out, talked the same way before Mussolini and Hitler came to power. "What would happen in a deep depression, and with mass unemployment?", they ask. I believe America has learned how to forestall any depressions such as that of the early 1930's. Moreover, at the height of its unemployment crisis in 1932, America turned not to a demagogue but to Franklin Roosevelt. Nearly every student of politics in the United States to-day believes that even a "medium" depression would bring the Democrats and not the Republicans into power.

Nor is there evidence that Senator McCarthy has the talent required to exploit an explosive or revolutionary situation, if such existed. Mussolini and Hitler came forward with blueprints for economic and social action. They even aspired to be political philosophers. They captured and retained power partly on the promises of their programme. Senator McCarthy has no programme. His appeal is to fear and hate, not to hope and faith. To achieve top success a demagogue must appeal both ways.

Although he has now been a Senator for seven years, and has perforce voted hundreds of times, not one American in ten thousand could say how he has cast his ballot on the major substantive issues before the Congress. He is not known for any positive proposals, either responsible or irresponsible. He is known only for his accusations and his calumny. The Wisconsin Senator may yet learn to develop positive proposals. He could perhaps thus broaden the base of his political support. If he were to do so he might fall neatly into the classical pattern of a "tyrant" identified in the Greek city-states by both Aristotle and Plato. In The Republic, Socrates says:

> When a tyrant first appears above ground he is a protector . . . Having a mob entirely at his disposal the tyrant is not restrained from shedding the blood of kinsmen; by the favourite method of false accusation he brings them into court and murders them; some he kills and others he banishes, at the same time hinting at the abolition of debts and the partition of lands.

Senator McCarthy does not appear to be moving towards a phase of promises, though he is said to have considered advancing a plan for federal payments of $100 to everyone over 65 (the proportion of voters in this age category is increasing). But even if he were to enter this path, there is no present reason to fear that his "mob" could reach such proportions as to enable him "to take over the country."

It is true that some oil interests which seek to grab the so-called tidelands oil reserves are supporting Senator McCarthy. It is true that some of the high-tariff interests are McCarthyites. It is true that the extremist fringes have rallied around him. But such groups do not make a party, a programme, a platform, or any considerable portion of America. Let me add, parenthetically, that there is no McCarthy equivalent of Mussolini's Black Shirts, or Hitler's Storm Troopers.

We must ask, however, why Joseph McCarthy gets so many headlines. The answer requires insight into the current state of the American mind. Secondly, it requires some understanding of American politics and of the American press. I shall largely concern myself here with the current state of the American mind. I have said that our people have no deep-seated national neuroses which explain McCarthyism. Nevertheless, a national mood has prevailed since 1946 which helps explain it. This mood is a product of the cold war. This mood has been deepened by the war in Korea. America's wars in the past have been hot and absolute. A condition of relative war, of half war, limited war, is new and perplexing. The emotional reaction of many Americans to this new condition is one of bafflement, of exasperation, that this should be forced upon us.

It would be strange if the dramatic events of the past eight years had had no emotional impact on America. In 1945 tens of millions of Americans hoped and believed that the western world would get along with the Soviet Union. Winston Churchill's latest memoirs now remind us of these high hopes. But by mid-1946, before a year had passed after V-J day, the full invective of the Communist propaganda throughout the world had turned against the United States. I remember when as Assistant Secretary of State, in my speeches of 1946 and 1947, I read Soviet broadcast bulletins aloud to my audiences, they gasped in astonishment and dismay. This Russian propaganda, in bitter, brutal and terrifying terms, charged Americans with great crimes including that of being " war-mongers ". This is about the last thing Americans believed themselves to be.

Then came the United States decision on Greece and Turkey, the Truman Doctrine— a most unfamiliar and unsought rôle for Americans. This was followed by the great decisions on European economic aid (let us again recall that the Marshall Plan proposals originally embraced aid to the Soviet Union and to its European satellites, an offer rudely rejected). In turn came the United States determination to station troops in Europe, and to spend huge sums for rearmament and for the North Atlantic Treaty programme. These momentous decisions were spurred and punctuated by the Communist seizure of Czechoslovakia; the Berlin airlift; the development of atomic weapons in the Soviet Union; by the fall of China, deeply shocking to Americans; and finally by the Communist aggression in Korea, which sent casualty telegrams into more than 140,000 American homes.

In each country of crisis—Greece, Korea and the rest—were potent internal enemies—the Communist fifth columns. Could such a fifth-column enemy also exist in America? Certainly the theory of history-by-conspiracy-of-traitors-and-spies was easy to understand. Could it apply to America? Even in the British Commonwealth some conspirators have been yanked into the spotlight. An atomic spy ring was exposed in Canada. Dr. Alan Nunn May and Dr. Klaus Fuchs were convicted in England. In America, amid headlines sustained for many months, Alger Hiss had finally been convicted—and before Joseph McCarthy, in February of 1950, began his tirades about 205 (later 57 or 81) card-carrying Communists in the State Department.

Powerful Republican newspapers propounded the history-by-conspiracy thesis. Poland and China, they said, had been " sold-out " to the Communists at Yalta, under the influence of Hiss. These newspapers were quick to build up Senator McCarthy. Some of them provided him with " facts ". They saw in him the makings of a perfect " hatchet man " not only to axe the Democrats but—and to some this was even more important—to decapitate the so-called " internationalist " Republicans, largely Easterners who were even charged with being controlled by Number 10 Downing Street.

At this point I must re-emphasize a most important fact: there has been a Communist conspiracy in America. Senator McCarthy's version of it is false—for example, his " 205 card-carrying Communists in the State Department." But his headlines have developed against the background not only of a massively menacing Communist threat abroad but a highly-dramatized conspiratorial threat at home. There is no doubt to Americans that there have been solid grounds for our country's deep concern about the Communist conspiracy. However, the Communist party had its most rapid growth in the United States in the 1920's. It reached its peak strength when its presidential candidate polled 102,991 votes in 1932. It has been declining steadily since then. The Federal Bureau of Investigation reports that there are 24,796 party members to-day—one adult in every 4,000.

These 25,000 can perhaps be called the "hard-core". Many are schooled in conspiracy. They must be regarded as potent and dangerous. When American Communist leaders have been tried for conspiracy to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the United States Government, they have been convicted. Americans have approved the steps taken by our two great labour organizations, the American Federation of Labour and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, to expose and expel the Communist leadership of constituent unions. We have approved also those Congressional investigating committees which have tried to be just and careful in their methods; which have helped bring to public attention the Communist cells in Government and in other key areas of national life, notably communications. Rebecca West, the gifted British journalist, began her recent series on McCarthyism with a false first premise. She assumed that "McCarthyism" is a term applied to all attempts by the Congress to expose Communism in the United States. Europeans should understand clearly that the word "McCarthyism" means the perversion of legislative inquiry. It does not apply to fair and careful investigations of Communism or of anything else. Recently former President Truman gave an eloquent description of McCarthyism:

> It is the corruption of truth, the abandonment of our historical devotion to fair play. It is the abandonment of the 'due process' of law. It is the use of the big lie and the unfounded accusation against any citizen in the name of Americanism or security. It is the rise to power of the demagogue who lives on untruth; it is the spread of fear and destruction of faith in every level of our society.

Three and more years before Joseph McCarthy first noticed the Communists in 1950, I had helped, as Assistant Secretary of State under Secretaries Byrnes and Marshall, to establish higher security standards in our Government by insisting on full investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the thousands of employees under my direction. Later, as a United States Senator, I fought him not because I denied the existence of a Communist danger within the Government and within America. I fought him because he, for personal and partisan ends, sought to exploit this danger, and America's mood of anxiety, with reckless and irresponsible charges; because by so doing he injured innocent people—non-Communists—unjustly; because he has challenged our hard-won western doctrine of the presumption of innocence; because he is fomenting a dangerously simple interpretation of the forces at work in our twentieth century world; and because he can, if he goes unchallenged, use the " subversive " label to frighten worthy but dissenting citizens into verbal conformity and thus weaken our hard-won right to freedom of expression—the very touchstone of our western creed.

Thus the setting, and the national mood of anxiety, have been propitious for Senator McCarthy's drive for the headlines. The theme he chose—spies and secret agents—is a proven favourite of fiction. To this theme he has brought a personal talent for mixing fact and fiction which borders on genius. He is energetic and he is resourceful, moving from one accusation to another swiftly and with an adroit sense of timing. It is no handicap to his newsworthiness that he has been widely publicized as a war hero, and that he bears an Irish name. The press in America is overwhelmingly Republican and is thus especially receptive to accusations against Democrats. But even the Democratic papers concede that he " makes news ", and they too give him headlines.

But above all—for Europeans to understand him and McCarthyism they must understand the significance of the fact that he is a United States Senator; any U.S. Senator has vast potential power, whenever he wants to exercise it; for a six-year term he has unlimited access to one of the world's most resonant rostrums. Europeans who take their impressions of our American Congress from political cartoons do not adequately understand that in America Senators are second in prestige only to the U.S. President himself. When I told President Truman that I had been offered an appointment to the U.S. Senate by the Governor of my state, and that I was considering turning it down, he sprang from his chair in his White House office and turned on me and said: " Bill, it is the second greatest honour that can come to a man." The elemental fact of this power and prestige is not understood in Europe. The U.S. Cabinet Officer calls upon the U.S. Senator and not the other way around. Rare is the Senator who would resign to accept a Cabinet post.

Any accusation against any individual made publicly by a U.S. Senator is considered newsworthy in America. When it is an accusation against Government officials, high or low, suggesting treason, espionage or sedition, or conspiracy to commit any of these, it can become sensationally newsworthy. Senator McCarthy has provided a steady stream of such accusations over the past four years. His high irresponsibility is perhaps best attested by the fact that many other Senators, Republican and Democratic, had heard all the rumour and gossip and had read the " confidential reports " on Communists in our Government much earlier than he. They did not choose to use such information publicly, even though it might have proved to their partisan political advantage. I well remember, during my service as Assistant Secretary of State in 1945-6-7, the concern of highly placed and responsible Senators over alleged Communist infiltration into the State Department. They had "the names". They gave "the names" to me and to other administration officers, and action developed at the administrative level. But, because they had no conclusive evidence, they never used names, even on the Senate floor.

Senator McCarthy's opening salvo, in his campaign for headlines, contained what many think is the most electrifying accusation in American history, although few political professionals were electrified at first. In a speech at Wheeling, West Virginia, in February 1950, he waved a paper aloft and announced: "I have here in my hand a list of 205—a list of names that were made known to the Secretary of State as being members of the Communist Party—and who nevertheless are still working and shaping policy in the State Department." This was the beginning. It was to be followed by a long succession of fresh charges at intervals of a few days or weeks.

In a 60,000 word speech on the floor of the Senate in 1951 he reached a peak of audacity when he described General George Marshall, who had been successively Chief of Staff during the 1939-1945 war, Secretary of State and Secretary of Defence, as a party to a conspiracy to turn the world over to Communism, "a conspiracy of infamy so black that, when it is finally exposed, its principals shall be forever deserving of the maledictions of all honest men." I walked through the Senate while he was droning his 60,000 words for the Congressional Record. Only one bored Democrat was there, to demand a roll call if necessary. Senator McCarthy's Republican colleagues treated this speech with contempt, as did the Democrats, even though he had personally written each of the other 95 Senators asking each of us to be on hand to hear his sensational revelations. He spent the several hours reading the speech so that he would secure immunity from libel laws when he later published the speech as a book. Under American law, no Senator can be sued for what he says on the floor of the Senate.

Now it is a fact that Senator McCarthy has not in four years proved anybody in the State Department to be a member of the Communist Party. Some employees named by him were later separated from the Department for "security" reasons, some because the Department was tightening its criteria for dismissal, some even perhaps because the Department was shell-shocked by his charges. The Department's criteria evolved from "reasonable evidence" of disloyalty, or of indiscretion, to "reasonable doubt" of loyalty or of discretion. Others resigned before reviews of their cases were completed; but almost all these were old and disputed cases. All, however, were hailed by Senator McCarthy as his vindication, even though nothing remotely approaching a justification of his original accusations had developed. After his own party came to power in 1952, his Senate seniority automatically gave him a chairmanship of a powerful Committee, and a large staff to help him dig up evidence to support his charges. Yet he has continued to fail to produce the evidence.

A question that arises is this: "Why hasn't this history of failure—this record of crying 'wolf'—destroyed Senator McCarthy?" The answer is that accusations are vivid and memorable while denials and explanations by comparison are tedious and dull. This elementary psychological fact underlies the special protections with which western law surrounds an accused man. Joseph McCarthy is not bound by these rules of fairness; he is after the headlines; he is conducting what he calls "exposures", rather than criminal trials. His failures are obscured by the complexity and the relative dullness of the rebuttal, and by his skill in substituting new charges. The press and public do not concentrate very hard on the rebuttal.

Here is an example: if Senator McCarthy accuses a Government employee of membership in an organization now judged to be Communist-controlled and subversive, this charge is simple and dramatic. The individual's reply, that his membership began before the organization became a Communist front, and ended after he decided that it could not be rescued from the Communists, is apt to be involved, hard to headline, not easy to remember. This illustration becomes the more true if what is involved is a label, or a phrase, and not a provable or disprovable fact: thus Secretary Acheson is not charged by Senator McCarthy with being a Communist but is called "the Red Dean of Fashion"; Ambassador Jessup is dubbed by Senator McCarthy as a member of a "three-horse team" with the Moscow Izvestia and the New York Daily Worker; others are said to have "an affinity for Communism", or to be "soft toward Communism", or "Communist thinkers".

In the Suppliants, Euripedes, speaking of an earlier McCarthy, writes, "and yet by fresh calumnies of others he hides his former failures and escapes punishment." Senator McCarthy improves upon the historically familiar pattern of accusation, the pattern of the Lie or the Half-Lie, with his acute sense of timing. In the new and swift media of communications, notably television, he finds spectacular scope for his timing, and here is his new dimension of demagogery. Whenever public interest is languishing, or one of his earlier charges appears to be collapsing, or a development appears to be turning against him, he comes forward with a fresh and sensational charge, out of an arsenal accumulated and hoarded for just such contingencies. He always has a dozen dossiers in reserve. The new media seize the fresh charge, and abandon the old, which thereupon ceases to be newsworthy.

Among the theories in the United States about how to cope with Senator McCarthy are two which take inadequate account of his marksmanship as a headline hunter. One is: "Give him enough rope and he will hang himself." The second is: "Ignore him and he will wither away." Both theories underrate his talents; often they are the wishful hopes of Republicans who want to use him and then forget him; who seek to cash the cheques without making the deposits in the bank. His power, the power of the headlines, is deceptive and is hard to calculate by his Republican allies as well as his Republican and Democratic foes. But it is safe to generalize that his popularity does not match his publicity; his headlines do not and will not translate into votes. His power of publicity is a real power; and he will command this power, in varying degrees, as long as he retains his personal virtuosity and his Senate seat. But this is not the same thing as political power, which in a democracy is the ability to win votes.

His virtuosity was nowhere clearer than in the recent episode in which Attorney General Brownell undertook to revive the case of the late Harry Dexter White, Treasury official. The episode became a sensation because, for the first time, a Cabinet officer, considered to be a spokesman for the Eastern wing of the Republican Party, appeared to be adopting the technique of Senator McCarthy—indeed he seemed to attempt to outdo the Senator by accusing former President Truman of outright treason. Many observers believed the White affair to be the opening of an effort by Brownell to " take McCarthy's issue away from him." In a single television broadcast Senator McCarthy restored his primacy and laid the groundwork for possible later accusations of laxity and ineptitude by Mr. Brownell and President Eisenhower himself.

I am asked frequently, and not only in Europe but in the United States, why so few members of the United States Senate, a body of 96 members which regards itself—and with justice—as one of the world's great deliberative bodies, have seen fit publicly to challenge their bumptious colleague from Wisconsin. The reasons are mixed. I have already alluded to the " rope " and the " wither away " theories. There is also the Republican theory that Senator McCarthy is useful to flay the Democrats; and the Democratic theory that he is a " Republican problem "—that he will eventually split the Republicans if the Democrats do not force the Republicans to unite behind him. Still another explanation is the tradition that no Senator may impugn the motives of any other Senator; his violation of the tradition does not justify others. And yet another explanation is the wish of almost all Senators to avoid creating precedents, in any effort to contain him, that might limit the remarkable powers to which they themselves are heir.

A more important reason is far simpler: it is fear. A Senator who undertakes to attack and entangle himself with Joseph McCarthy must expect to be tarred with the McCarthy pitch. I remember one influential Senator who came to me in deep anxiety on the floor of the Senate, and said: " Bill, McCarthy just told me that if I support your resolution to expel him from the Senate, he will come into my state and defeat me." This remark shows the fear but it also indicates that some American politicians—maybe most American politicians—like many of my European friends—grossly overrate Senator McCarthy's political prowess. He has persuaded many that his personal denunciations may influence enough votes to cost a member of Congress his seat, at least in closely contested races. This argument is a potent deterrent to Congressmen who might otherwise oppose him. I am myself sometimes listed as one of the victims of Senator McCarthy's power to influence votes.

I believe these politicians are wrong. Purely as a problem in practical politics, and apart from the moral considerations involved, it is my belief that an attack on Senator McCarthy may win for a man campaigning for office at least as many votes as it will lose. The net effect of Senator McCarthy on the voting in November 1952 in my own state of Connecticut was negligible, no more than a few thousand votes either way, out of more than a million cast. The decisive factor on the vote in Connecticut was the personal popularity of General Eisenhower. Representative Lester Johnson, who in a "bye-election" in November 1953 became the first Democrat ever to win election to Congress from the Ninth Congressional District of Wisconsin, describes "the misinformation about Senator McCarthy's influence in Wisconsin" as follows:

> People forget, too, that 1952, the year of McCarthy's re-election, was a Republican sweep that brought that party back to power for the first time in 20 years. In that election he ran far behind the entire Republican state. Dwight Eisenhower carried the state by 357,569 votes. Gov. Walter Kohler's margin was 407,327. Secretary of State Fred Zimmerman, against whom McCarthy had mounted a strong purge attempt in the Republican primary because of his outspoken opposition to McCarthy, was re-elected by a margin of 505,000 votes and polled the highest vote ever given any politician in the state. McCarthy's margin of victory, 139,000, doesn't indicate that he is the voice of Wisconsin in national affairs.

In my opinion Senator McCarthy would be beaten if he ran to-day in Wisconsin. He would be badly beaten, running by himself.

In the autumn of 1952 McCarthy travelled 5,000 miles to campaign in the state of Washington for Republican Senator Cain; Cain, running with Mr. Eisenhower, was resoundingly defeated by Democratic Representative Jackson. Senator McCarthy went into West Virginia to campaign on behalf of former Republican Senator Revercomb; Revercomb was resoundingly defeated by Democratic Senator Kilgore. He went into Montana and campaigned for Republican Senator Ecton; Ecton was unseated by Democratic Representative Mansfield. Do these excursions of Senator McCarthy indicate that he was riding the wave of the future?

I have tried to make three points in this article: (1) that the tremendous publicity he receives in the American press, and by reflection in the European press, is traceable to a combination of the man's personal talent for making headlines and the national mood of anxiety; (2) that his publicity is not an accurate measure of the size of his political following, and is not translatable into votes, and (3) that the attempt to draw an analogy between Hitler and Mussolini on the one hand and Senator McCarthy on the other is unwarranted and misleading because America is not now vulnerable to their kind of leadership and because Senator McCarthy is not accepted as a leader by a mass following. I now concede one disturbing parallel on the third point. Joseph McCarthy is publicly tolerated and encouraged, just as were Hitler and Mussolini, by many conservatives who privately deplore and loathe him.

Harder to dissipate than the myth of his political power are the illusions behind the tacit or explicit support—or at least tolerance—Senator McCarthy receives from many able and responsible leaders of the Republican Party. Here I refer not only to members of the Senate but to leaders in the present administration; and I refer to influential leaders in publishing, in business and in the professions. Certain publishers have made their staffs available to help write his speeches and turn out his propaganda. I have heard it estimated that this McCarthy free "staff work" totals no less than 500 man-hours, highly skilled man-hours, a week. This is in addition to his salaried staff estimated by Look Magazine at 50 people.

Newspaper publishers who support or excuse Senator McCarthy in their editorials would not accept him as a presidential candidate. If they took him, it would merely be to use him as a pre-convention candidate, giving him a "build-up" in the hope that with him they could destroy rival Republican candidates from the so-called international wing of the party. The kindest interpretation to put upon the toleration of Senator McCarthy by some of these politicians, business men and publishers, is that they honestly believe that, in the national interest, the unity of the Republican party must be preserved at almost any cost. But many more look upon him with indulgence because he uses his peculiar talents to castigate the Democrats—the political indulgence that "all's fair in love, war and politics." Those with this attitude have felt that he can be used as a party instrument—that he can be managed and contained and controlled in the party interest. They are the amateur Machiavellis who, to Europeans, provide the disturbing parallel to the early support Mussolini and Hitler received from some well-meaning conservatives.

As I write this President Eisenhower appears to be trying to dissociate himself from the taint of Senator McCarthy. But his Attorney General, Mr. Brownell, and the chairman of the party, Mr. Hall, are aligning themselves with the amateur Machiavellis. The end of the road for McCarthy and his patrons, however, will not be in America what Fascism and Naziism reached in Europe, if only because our American Machiavellianism is strictly amateur. I assure my English friends that Joseph McCarthy has about as much chance to be President as Oswald Mosley has to be Prime Minister. He is a boil on the body politic, not a cancer.

Senator Taft had the support of millions of ordinary Americans who respected him for his integrity and for what they regarded as his remarkable grasp of public issues. Yet he failed three times to secure the Republican nomination for President. The Republican millions who admired Senator Taft hold no similar respect for Senator McCarthy. They would never wish to see him become chief of the American State—as the successor to George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. McCarthy is not Mr. Republican—or Mr. Anybody. The Republican political leaders who are not above trying to make use of him would be revolted at the thought of serving under him. I can conceive of only one crisis sufficiently catastrophic to give him a remote chance to seize top leadership—and this is the chaos of a military disaster. Few Americans, if any, can even conceive of such a crisis.

For the discernible future, the maximum extent of his political influence (which is not the same thing as the power of his publicity) is the control of a bloc within the Senate or at a Republican convention. In time of crisis this bloc might conceivably secure a veto over Republican policy or candidates. In such a crisis, if McCarthy policies could become Republican policy, I do not feel there is any serious chance of such Republican policy prevailing. To the extent that Senator McCarthy's policies prevail in the Republican party, to just that extent will the Republican chance to remain in power dwindle and diminish. Indeed, his is the symbol and the cutting edge of a cleavage within the Republican Party which could destroy the power of the Republicans for a generation. He could help produce a major re-alignment of forces within our American political system. Under certain balance-of-power possibilities at a Republican convention, Senator McCarthy might exercise a veto on the choice of a presidential nominee. This is the peak of his power potential. Such a possibility is distressing enough to many of us in America but I hope that this estimate of his conceivable potential will prove reassuring to the European friends of the United States. Of this they can be absolutely sure: any Republican candidate, so selected, is destined for certain and overwhelming defeat.

The deep-rooted traditions of fair play and free speech in the American democracy, tested and strengthened now over the past 178 years, will not be easily dissipated. The tradition is too strong and the man who has set himself against it too weak.

Dear Danny and Sylvia:

I am grateful to you for sending me Danny's program on the Ed Murrow show. Yes, it is very unhappy indeed that the UN would not let you ask for money at the end of the program. Danny did the best he could in a tough situation, telling the audience to do whatever its heart indicated! But an audience needs more guidance than this!!

My wife and I and our children were delighted with this wonderful travelogue. We congratulate Danny on it with all our hearts. The "Pied Piper" part of Danny's appealed to the children so that they wanted to get right up and follow him. But I liked his rôle as Ambassador. I turned to Dr. Harold Lasswell, who was with us, and I suppose Dr. Lasswell is admittedly the world's leading scholar in the field of propaganda, and I allowed that Danny was worth more as a propagandist than the Bolshoi Ballet and all the rest of Russia's experts put together . On this we all agreed.

Dr. Lasswell and I thought the high spots were the scenes dealing with leprosy in Nigeria.

I hope Ed Murrow was right in his closing, that this is not the end but the beginning.

Very sincerely yours,

Dear Ed:

I'm writing you from Phoenix. I shall be back in New York on January 11, to be there until February 15. This is my longest stretch in a good many years and I am reminded how long it has been since we visited. Are you too busy to set aside a day for lunch? I shall understand it if you are. If not, pick your own day. Or maybe you'll be around some evening for dinner and this might work out better than lunch. One day will be like another for me.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Mr. Mitchell

FROM: William Benton

Mitch, I had lunch with Ed Murrow this week and as I listened to his description of the films he is making, I wondered what opportunity there might be for distribution of them in the schools. For instance, his recent one and one-half hour film on Africa (for which he took the astonishing total of 250,000 feet). He is sending this to me, together with another one. Next year he expects to be putting on one of these one hour or one and one-half hour films on the first Sunday of every month. This will be a lot of production. Would the schools show these films in their auditoriums? Would the addition of such a film, on top of one of the entertainment films, make too much of a program?

Ed says he remembers you, or the remembers about you, from your days at CBS. Should we investigate with CBS the possible distribution not only of Ed Murrow's films but other CBS films as well? I am sure you have thought about this. I think I made the same inquiry to you after I saw Chet Bowles' film on India produced by NBC.

Ed is shortly to be at his home for three weeks, very near New York. I told him about our films and I think he would like to look at a bunch of them. He has a 16 mm projector. Could we send him 20 or 30 of these selected films, with little one paragraph memorandums about each film? Maybe you'll want to send him a list of 100 or 200 films and ask him to check off those which sound most interesting to him. Ask him also whether he would like to have you drop in on him the next time you are in New York to talk about distribution. Finally, ask him whether he wants someone to come along to operate the projector and show the films, that you know that there are many in our New York office that would welcome the opportunity.

Dear Bill:

How typically thoughtful of you to send along our exchange of telegrams when you were serving your country.

I envy the six weeks on the yacht and the companionship of Adlai, and only wish it had been possible for me to accept your kind invitation.

I had a talk with Mr. Mitchell and have had to tell him that there is no possibility of my making any decisions or commitments about the future until I have at least had a few weeks away from this grind.

I thought these would interest you and remind you of the days when I was trying to bring you into the Department of State as its top "spokesman."

I am leaving today for the yacht and for the next six weeks with Adlai - and I am very, very sorry that you are not to be along.

I fear I will have to send you my Chicago speech to the Economic Club, so that you may understand Baruch's letter. But don't bother to read the speech unless certain parts of it appeal to you. What an amazing letter! Isn't he eighty-six? Can you imagine doing the same at eighty-six? How extraordinary he is for his physical vitality and his driving curiosity, wholly apart from other attributes. He sounds as passionately interested as you and I thought we were at forty.

I told you I'd send you this letter and here it is.

My dear Mr. Benton:

John Howe has sent me a copy of your speech before the Economic Club of Chicago, April 8, 1959.

May I take the liberty of an old friend and one who desires to understand another and be understood, to comment as I read.

Our original sin or difficulty, whichever you prefer to call it, was when World War II commenced we did not mobilize all our resources in a manner which our experience in World War I had taught us. We did not put ceilings over the whole economy, including the prices of all things, wages, services, use of money and higher taxation to pay as much of the cost of the war as possible and prevent the inexcusable profiteering that was practiced by those remaining at home while so many were away fighting and dying. We then failed to hold our resources together to meet the very danger of which you speak. We knew at Potsdam where our greatest enemy lay - Communism, led by Russia.

Much of what you say in the first few pages about Khruschev could have been prevented by not scuttling and running too soon. Much of the talk upon gold and the so-called experts was laid before our people as early as 1939 when Japan threatened.

You were right when you say the Russians are playing for big stakes and know what the stakes are. But what is the American Businessman with his high-priced, high-pressuring public relations men doing? He is calling upon the government to help him by weakening itself. He demands that the government lessen its tax receipts with a lot of reasoning which has no foundation and fact. Evil results are now encompassing us.

When the present administration came in it would have been far better to reduce the debt and increase the United States Government's credit than to reduce taxes - having the opposite effect. The inherent difficulty lies here with us. Nor have I been impressed with the so-called economists. There is only one thing in economics and that is the law of supply and demand plus the human equation. To get a good government we must bring them together, always keeping in mind the effect that one has upon the other. We have the resources. We have the intelligence. But we are worshipping a false god -- materialism.

Since the end of World War I and the experience I had in it and the Treaty of Versailles, I warned time and time again, but alas, with little success, against the very things which are facing this government which has given you and me and all the others an equal opportunity to pursue happiness so far as it is humanly possible.

The great difference between many others and myself is in expecting government to do much of that which one should do for himself. I realize as civilization grows both in numbers and needs there must be regulation to keep wide open the door of opportunity. At the same time I know that we have gone far from the little mercy of man. I could recall to you many of the present day ameliorations of those who cannot care for themselves. But let us not be carried too far too fast in the doing of things that will injure and perhaps destroy us in trying to reach the goals which civilization must have in mind.

Sincerely yours,

Alas, alack, and every expletive in the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

I do not finish my chores here until July 15, and we must then go to the West Coast to see my mother. You are generous and gracious to invite us, but there is just no way it can be done.

The other night John Gunther and I made a pact that one would not go to China without the other.

So far as Pegler is concerned, his amusing venom aimed in my direction stems largely from the fact that I testified for Quent Reynolds in his suit against Pegler. Reynolds picked up one hundred fifty thousand bucks -- the biggest judgment ever handed down by a New York court.

So if you decide to sue anybody, have me summoned as a witness.

Dear Ed:

When I talked to you by phone I forgot a question that may be the most important of all.

In your new freedom, are you to be in Europe this summer and should we re-examine the possibility of the yacht? The best chance would be for you and your wife to join us at Alicante on July 11th - for the ten days cruising through the Islands to reach Palma on the 21st. Or to join us at Palma for the ten days cruising to reach Malta on August 1st. Or to join us at Malta on August 1st for a week or two weeks up the Italian coast. Dear Bob:

You may not have seen Westbrook Pegler's piece attached on "Egbert Murrow". I think it will amuse you. I am reminded of Bud Kelland's bitterness against Pegler. Believe it or not, Pegler once wrote such a piece about Bud Kelland. He later came up to Kelland at some conference or luncheon and extended his hand and attempted to greet him cordially. Kelland snarled at him, according to Kelland's story, while at the same time he put his hand behind his back and refused to shake hands with him - "Westbrook, I am now a member of a growing society which includes all your former friends; this society is known as The Former Friends of Westbrook Pegler."

The only thing he properly pins on Ed is the cigarette smoke!

He's never done as complete a job as this on me, but he's aimed similar shafts in my direction. My recollection is that you have not been overlooked.

Sincerely,

William Benton

Murrow Exited

Posturing Spieler

By WESTBROOK PEGLER

The final disappearance of Egbert Murrow, the genie — a cloud of cigarette smoke, is now compared to the ominous fact that this empty fellow reigned so long as an oracle of political theology over people pretending to wise judgment. George Sokolsky, with his instinct for the jugular, pointed out a few days after Murrow crumbled like cigarette ash on his own vest, that Murrow had never been a newspaperman. He was a showman. Of all the types of showmen, Murrow's was the lowest. For he was, so to speak, a patchwork, spieling from his ladder to lay-people the yields with laudations of miraculous comments of tiger-marrow and pay-later savings. In the original version of this breed, at circus fairs and carnivals, sly strangers lifted watches and screw-top purses as mountebanks brought spells of preoccupation on gaping innocents.

EGBERT'S UTMOST was an appearance before a select company of cadets at West Point by an invitation so cagey that when all was said and done it appeared that some cadets had taken it on themselves to ask him up. No cadet has such authority. Yet Murrow got this forum for a political exultation over Joe McCarthy, who was then a rambunctious, living, kicking issue, and his army was defendant in a disgraceful scandal. The West Point code of honor forbids evasion and equivocation. Be that as it may—.

But after four years, Murrow went on the air with a paltry news about prostitution as a device of ordinary commerce—and suddenly he was gone.

He may return, deflated to his intrinsic unimportance, but this final episode of the posturing spieler who could command even the participation of a Catholic archbishop in his program on Good Friday, has shown us that radio-TV is vaudeville.

Glibbering charlatans have won counterfeit renown as radio reporters, but by no stretch of the imagination and charity can their text be adjudged literate writing. Some cannot read simple news dispatches with normal emphasis. Few even write their own material.

THE GREAT WRONG of Murrow's broadcast inferentially accusing all business men who visit New York of demanding prostitutes as lagniappe has not been brought into clear focus. For his excuse it was said that Murrow knew nothing about the dirty business, but spieled a script prepared by faceless nonentities at CBS. The crude work was done by a woman who refused to discuss her own past when I phoned her to ask pertinent questions.

Murrow's whole attack on Joe McCarthy was a charge that Joe said a woman employed on secret code work in the Pentagon was a Communist. The whole howling pack yelled "McCarthyism," claimed mistaken identity and accused the senator of character assassination. But only a little while before Murrow undoubtedly did use faceless informers against whole categories of decent Americans, in a fraud presented as fact, the FBI solemnly affirmed that the woman accused by McCarthy did hold the Pentagon job and a card in the Communist Party.

So Egbert is gone. And a thinning puff of cigarette smoke is all that remains of a great delusion of a gullible people.

Dear Ed:

Yes, that is quite a piece in "The Reporter". But do you really make a case for the fact that General Motors should pay for the time? After all, this time was allocated by the FCC to the stations in the name of the voters - and it's difficult for one who isn't immersed in the industry's problems to believe that a reasonable allocation of time should not be contributed by the stations who have received these valuable licenses. And are you talking in big enough terms when you suggest only thirty or sixty programs per year? What is the cost for time in such minuscule quantities?

I am happy with your great tribute to Elmer Davis, with which I agree. And I congratulate you on stating unequivocally that many licensees have "welshed on their promises." This is crystal clear to anyone who thinks about the matter, but the trouble is that nobody does think about it - and then nobody comments on it.

You're the guy that makes the perfect diagnosis and then comes up with a weak and unhappy prescription. Yes, your diagnosis is marvellous. Television is indeed being used "to distract, delude, amuse, and insulate....." - and yes - "Television is rusting in the scabbard during a battle for survival."

I particularly like your much needed comment, which should be reiterated on every possible occasion, "That the newspapers and magazines are the only instrument of mass communication which remain free from sustained and regular critical comment." This is why I still advocate the establishment of Bob Hutchins'proposed Commission on the Freedom of the Press.

Dear Bill:

First of all, best of luck in your venture in Connecticut.

I do recall that President Truman mentioned your name in connection with the MacArthur firing, but I can't remember the content or context.

Both you and Mr. Truman are so much more skilled in politics than I that it would be presumptuous for me to suggest how he could help you.

Dear Ed:

I was fascinated by your remarkable interview with President Truman on Sunday.

I doubt if you will remember that I was the first man to defend Truman on the floor of the Senate, after the MacArthur firing. I was on my feet for three and a half hours, with fifteen interruptions by Republican Senators. And of course you remember well my background on McCarthy.

Not long ago Averell Harriman gave a little party for President Truman and he drew me into the corner and said, "Bill, I want to help you in every way I can in your efforts in Connecticut. Please tell me how. But please make sure that I help get you votes, in what you ask me to do - and that I don't hurt you in any way. I'm an old hand and I'm sure you will understand what I mean."

Now I haven't been able to figure out just what to ask President Truman to do for me. I remember when I left for my second campaign and he complimented me by saying, "Bill, you have the best voting record in the Senate." I had the unusual background of having served under him in the State Department and then serving in the Senate during his administration.

I wondered if you had any clues for me out of your long interview. I don't suppose there is any possibility that he mentioned me in connection with the MacArthur or McCarthy matters, but you may have some other angle out of this intimate and remarkable experience you had with the President, which might enable you to advise me how to take advantage of his desire to help me.

I shall be after you for lunch when things quiet down a bit in Connecticut. I feel matters are developing reasonably well. I think this will be my last bid for public office. Any help you can be to me will be greatly - and permanently! - appreciated by me.

I think I mentioned Dean Tebbel's article to you. I am attaching it together with an interesting letter from Barry Bingham. He sat next to me at Dean Acheson's Foreign Policy Committee meeting in Washington a couple of weeks ago. The fact that I talked to him about this subject will show you it is much on my mind.

If you have any further suggestions, let me have them. What is needed most is specific ideas for membership of the commission. Dean Tebbel might be what is needed as a staff man to help run it.

Thanks for your constructive suggestion. Today I lunched with Ed Murrow who feels strongly about the need for the kind of "commission" recommended in the Hutchins-Luce report. He suggested a newspaper man "of impeccable reputation," and Mr. Casey Jones of Syracuse, as a possible chairman. Dear Bill:

Thanks so much for your note. It was good of you to remember my interest in the matter we discussed at luncheon in Washington. I have read the article by Dean Tebbel which you sent me, and I am returning it.

I am deeply concerned over the need for some sort of agency or commission which would make a continuing study of the press from the standpoint of quality and ethics. There are many such studies, as you know, on such subjects as advertising, circulation, typography, and even readability. The really essential part of the newspaper receives no such top-level attention.

The great difficulty in the past has been to devise any program that would be generally accepted by the press itself. As you remember so well, there was a tendency on the part of many publishers and editors to repudiate the Hutchins-Luce commission on the theory that it was made up of impractical laymen without direct experience of journalistic problems. Norman Isaacs and I ran into the same opposition when we tried, in both 1952 and 1956, to get an impartial study of campaign coverage made under the auspices of Sigma Delta Chi, the journalistic fraternity.

It has been my conclusion that the only hope would be to set up a committee consisting of recognized leaders in the field of journalistic education. They are the only people I know of who are knowledgeable about newspapers in the technical sense, but who are not tied to the policies and prejudices of individual papers. Any working newspaperman who took a place on such a committee would be assailed vigorously as "a traitor to his class." There might be an exception in the case of a few retired editors of national reputation such as Grove Patterson of the Toledo Blade.

In general, however, I think the journalism schools furnish the only real possibilities for the personnel of a useful commission. Certainly Dean Tebbel sounds like the kind of person who would be active and fearless. I would love to hear more about your thoughts in this connection. Please keep me in touch with any developments.

With best regards,

Yours sincerely,

Favoritism, Conformity and the One-Party Press

A newspaperman and educator examining this oft-made accusation, finds the press fearing self-examination and the large foundations refusing to study the problem.

By JOHN TEBBEL

The following is a condensation of an address by Dr. John Tebbel, chairman of the Department of Journalism, New York University, given before the Spring meeting of the National Editorial Association in New York on March 22.

The address represents Dr. Tebbel's tentative findings in a survey of 21 daily newspapers in their coverage of the 1956 Presidential campaign. The final report on the study is scheduled to be published in the Fall.

ONLY the most myopic partisan would deny that for the past twenty years the press has been overwhelmingly Republican. Until 1952 this was a negative phenomenon, because the press was not so much ardently pro-Republican as it was anti-Democratic. Since the advent of Mr. Eisenhower, however, we have witnessed the development of an unparalleled situation. Since he first became a candidate, the President has commanded an advocacy from the press which approaches the saturation point during campaigns. Between campaigns, he has enjoyed a virtually unquestioning support of a kind unknown to any other Chief Executive.

As an earnest student of American journalistic history, I can assure you that the one-party press we have today is unique. A modern newspaper would as soon think of insulting motherhood as to say anything derogatory about George Washington, but our first President in his own time was so venomously attacked by the press that when he left Philadelphia for the last time, he canceled all his newspaper subscriptions, and for the first few months of his retirement at Mount Vernon, he refused to read the papers at all.

Supported Eisenhower Because He Is a Republican

From Washington's day to our own, no President has escaped attacks until Mr. Eisenhower appeared on the scene. I am not suggesting that the President has no critics in the press. Indeed, perhaps the severest present criticism comes from Republican newspapers which have supported him because he is a Republican, not because they really understand or accept his political philosophy.

But the opposition to Mr. Eisenhower is piddling, to say the least. Only a scant half-dozen of the major dailies supported Adlai Stevenson in the last two campaigns, although it must be said that they numbered some of the country's most distinguished newspapers. They were joined by a smattering of the weeklies, but in not much greater proportion. Day-to-day criticism of the Administration exists, but it is mild for the most part, even among avowedly Democratic papers, and criticism of the critics is inclined to take on the tone of shocked reproof. Some newspapers, in fact, appear to believe that it is subversive to criticize the President.

Dr. John Tebbel
Chairman, Journalism Department

The question, then, is not whether we have a one-party press, for that is assuredly the case. The question is whether it is a bad thing to have it, and if so, in what way is it bad.

I addressed myself to one aspect of that question last Fall, when I began a study of campaign coverage by the newspapers in seven American cities. This study was made possible by reason of a $5,000 grant from the Shinner Foundation, and that in itself was news.

It was news because the press traditionally resents examination of itself, and fights it wherever and whenever possible. This was shown strikingly in the case of Sigma Delta Chi's proposal last year to make a major analysis of campaign coverage. The proposal, worked out carefully by a joint committee of newspaper executives and journalism educators, was to be financed by a $600,000 grant from the Ford Foundation. However, the approval of a jury of newspaper publishers, representing a cross-section of the business, was essential to carrying out the survey.

The project had to be abandoned when these publishers rejected it by an overwhelming percentage. The general tone of their statements was that publishers don't need and didn't want any surveys of their work that might possibly be critical, that such surveys didn't mean anything and didn't do any good, that in effect, people who were not in the club ought to be grateful we had a free press and should cease and desist from making trouble for it, because it was having a hard enough time anyway.

Constant Study Of Press Needed

Nevertheless, it was my conviction, as it is now, that the press ought to be studied constantly, not with the intention of reforming it, of attacking or defending it, of trying to tell it how to run its business, but simply to provide information about what kind of a job it is doing. The interpretation of that information would certainly vary, as it should in a democracy.

I proposed to study the news columns of representative daily newspapers during the campaign in an effort to discover, if possible, whether the one-party press was indeed, as charged in some quarters, slighting the opposition candidate and in effect running a publicity campaign for its own. I wanted to see whether there was, in fact, definite bias in the writing of the news, and the presentation of it in layout, headlines and pictures, and if so, whether it was subtle or obvious enough to be detected by the unsophisticated reader. Finally, I hoped to arrive at some kind of judgment as to whether the cumulative effect of this coverage was fair or prejudicial.

When I tried to get some foundation money to finance this modest proposal, I discovered that most of these giant philanthropies, or at least the ones I approached, were afraid of the press. By cautious inference, they appeared certain that the results of the survey would be attacked by the newspapers, no matter how it turned out, and that in turn the foundation would be attacked, and the whole thing would become the concern of those Congressional outriders who are so earnestly trying to prove that white is black and that foundations are a menace to the safety of the Republic.

Shinner Foundation Supports Project

Eventually the Shinner Foundation, a small and comparatively obscure organization founded by a philanthropic and public-spirited man from my native state, Michigan, gave me $5,000 to make the study. When the news was announced, one of the New York newspapers made a self-serving personal attack upon me in its editorial columns in terms which must have bored its numerous readers as much as it did me. Polite but guarded expressions of interest came from other newspapers about the country, and I began to compile a mailing list of people and publications who wanted to see the published results. The rest, as Shakespeare put it so well, was silence.

My work is far from over, and the published results may not be available until next autumn. But enough has been done so that certain trends can be observed and observations made.

The newspapers surveyed were those in New York, Providence, Chicago, Memphis, Houston, Kansas City, Missouri; and Los Angeles—twenty-one papers in all, representing various types of newspaper organization and community position. They were chosen to obtain a cross-section that would be manageable in so small a project, and representative, as far as possible, of the daily metropolitan press in the United States. Their circulation is nearly twenty-five million, daily and Sunday, nearly half the total circulation of all American dailies. Significantly, all but one supported Mr. Eisenhower.

This is the one-party press with a vengeance, then. And how did it perform during the campaign? These are some of the tentative conclusions the survey has reached:

First, on the credit side—

1. There was little evidence of bias in the writing of news, not even in those papers which were most partisan on their editorial pages. Nearly all of the prejudicial writing, what there was of it, occurred in local coverage rather than in the reports of correspondents traveling with the candidates.

2. There was a special effort on the part of some newspapers to present an impartial report of the campaign as it developed. A few papers, noted for their zealous Republicanism in the past, appeared to lean over backward in an effort to be fair.

3. Coverage of the campaign was, in general, reasonably complete in most papers, although in some it was subordinated and compressed in favor of local crime news. But many papers did an excellent job of balanced presentation in the closing weeks when the crisis in Hungary and the Suez invasion made the jobs of the news editor and the makeup man so difficult.

Bias Discovered In Picture Usage

Turning to the darker side, these things may be said, again on a tentative basis pending final summary of the results:

1. There was considerable evidence of bias in picture coverage on many papers. Taking into account the fact that Mr. Eisenhower was by far the most photogenic of the two candidates, and that as President there were more legitimate opportunities to display his picture, nevertheless there was a marked tendency to use more, bigger and better Eisenhower pictures. The President was shown consistently in dignified postures and situations which underlined both his popularity and the stature of his office. Mr. Stevenson, on the other hand, was shown just as consistently in the silly, undignified campaign stunt pictures which nearly all Presidential candidates must endure.

2. While there was an obvious attempt on some days, in some newspapers, to give equal news display to both candidates, the general tendency was to give Mr. Eisenhower better position and more favorable headlines. The President appeared on many front pages far more often than was justified by the news. The device of the press conference, which Mr. Eisenhower used adroitly as a campaign weapon, was abetted by some newspapers through the common practice of splitting up the conference into special topic stories.

Newspaper Coverage Favored Ike in '56

By reason of these and numerous other inequalities, the general effect of the campaign coverage in the newspapers studied was to play up Mr. Eisenhower and to play down Mr. Stevenson. In some cases the difference was small, in others it was marked and flagrant.

3. The violation of the news columns by editorial comment, disguised and otherwise, was not as frequent in this campaign as it has been in past years, presumably because the lack of personal animosity toward either candidate curbed the impulse to partisan excesses. However, there remains what I consider an unfortunate tendency on the part of some newspapers to display in the news columns political stories by by-line staff writers which are really highly partisan editorials and columns.

Favoritism Conformity and One-Party Press

Newspapermen understand what is going on in such cases, but I doubt if many readers do, and they may well accept editorial opinion as news. Only when such opinion is clearly labeled is its use in the news columns justified.

4. Finally, I should like to say that the quality of reporting and writing seemed high to me on the best newspapers, particularly considering the pressures and conditions under which so much campaign copy is written. But there was also far too much sloppy, slangy, plain bad writing, repetitive and cliche-ridden, far more superficial than newswriting needs to be. I am afraid that this is a growing problem in the business, and one editors should begin to combat if they take pride in their craft.

So much for the credits and debits. It may be argued that these conclusions I have given you are purely subjective judgments, and I readily grant this. I am not satisfied by the so-called scientific methods of content analysis, and I think the kind of survey which only measures column inches is largely futile. But subjective judgment need not be off-the-cuff reaction. The conclusions I have offered here are backed by substantial evidence, and they are as impartial as an informed, experienced but human analyst can make them.

Voters No Longer Swayed by Press

If we grant, for the moment, that the one-party press did give its man the best of the bargain in display of the news, and created in the news columns during the campaign an uncritical impression of the President and his candidacy—was this wrong? If, for example, the press had maintained an absolute and rigid impartiality, or if it had by some miracle been as heavily pro-Stevenson as it was pro-Eisenhower, would the result have been any different? There is no reason to think so. In terms of practical politics, what a newspaper does or doesn't say—in fact, what the entire press says or doesn't say—apparently no longer has the power to sway any significant number of voters in national elections, as it did less than fifty years ago. In spite of some specious argument to the contrary, this fact was demonstrated by the behavior of the voters from 1936 to 1944. The decline of the press's influence in national politics has been slow but steady since the Civil War, and it has not yet been arrested.

Lack of Diversity Spells Danger

This fact suggests the real danger in a one-party press of the kind we have today. It is not a danger that rises from loss of influence in itself, because the blackest pages in journalistic history were written when the press was a dominant factor in politics. The danger, rather, is that the press might lose so much of its vitality that it would no longer possess the diversity and sharp difference of opinion which are so essential to a free press in a democracy.

Here, I believe, is the heart of the problem. No matter which party occupies the White House, it ought to have the benefit of a free, vigorous, responsible press which will not hesitate to criticize. Our press has been relatively free since approximately 1830; it has been largely responsible since about 1900; but its present condition could scarcely be described as vigorous, in a political sense. At a time when the right of people to know is being more seriously abridged by government than at any period in this century, the attitude of the press is protective, for the most part. One can only imagine what outraged howls would arise from our newspapers if a Democratic regime were responsible for the blandly arrogant attacks on the rights and dignity of the press which are standard operating procedure in Washington today.

White House Press Corps Being Snubbed

Perhaps some of you read a recent column by Thomas L. Stokes, in which that veteran Washington reporter would not restrain his indignation over a small incident at the White House the other day, when Congressmen consulting with the President were smuggled out the back way while the correspondents, following long practice, were waiting near the front porch to question them as they left. When the reporters protested, Mr. Hagerty told them they were not "authorized" to wait there.

"Among the reporters thus duped," said Mr. Stokes, "were some who through the years have spent hours about the front porch of the White House, day and night, waiting for conferences in the White House to break up, and then interviewing the participants as they were leaving. We needed no authority—not even in wartime."

A trivial incident, perhaps, but as Mr. Stokes remarks, it "illuminates the growing tendency to restrict news coverage of the Eisenhower Administration and its chief figures." Oldtimers, he adds tartly, are "getting irked," because they can "remember days—and not too far in the past—when government was conducted in the fashion of a republic and not an empire."

Ideally, I suppose, newspapers should support no party, but act as a sort of public conscience, a conveyor of accurate and unbiased information in the news columns, and of honest and equally fair opinion in the editorial columns. I suppose, too, that most publishers sincerely believe this definition exactly fits their particular newspapers. But I do not think that millenium has been approached by any more than a handful of newspapers, some Democratic and some Republican.

Problem Not One Of Party Politics

It is not, I submit, a question of party politics, this problem of the one-party press. It is a question of resisting the dead weight of conformity, of developing a diversity of opinion which dares to be critical even of the party whose beliefs a paper supports and whose supremacy it has fought for.

I heard a noted publisher boasting the other day about the free American press—how it was known everywhere in the world as the only press that reflected every shade of political opinion. The accuracy of this statement may be doubted, because the newspapers of France and England certainly hold some kind of indoor record for reflecting shades of opinion. Yet our press, which was once varied, has today the monolithic appearance of a system dedicated to a single philosophy of government.

Hope Seen In Recent Developments

There might be more cause for alarm, however, if it were not also true that change is the great characteristic of our political life. Already the deep divisions in both parties are beginning to be reflected in the nation's newspapers. There are cracks in the solid wall of the one-party press. The extremes will break off first, no doubt, and after that no man can tell what new alliances will be formed. After all, it is hard to believe today that in Franklin Roosevelt's first Administration his staunchest supporters in the press included the Hearst newspapers, the Scripps-Howard newspapers, and the New York "Daily News." In the press, as in politics, anything can happen.

Cecil Brown: 'Non-Objective' Newscaster

He believes that listeners and viewers—if given a spectrum of viewpoints—can judge a reasonably balanced perspective of points of view and put commentators in their niche and category.

Aspects of the Brown controversy again occurred at CBS just recently, this time involving news commentators Edward R. Murrow and Eric Severeid. Scripts by Mr. Murrow and Mr. Sevareid, which were critical of the State Department's ban on entry into Red China by American newsmen, were killed by desk editors.

Now 49, Mr. Brown is looking forward to his sixth trek overseas since the end of World War II. This June, he and his wife leave for a peek behind the "Iron Curtain"—into Russia and Poland.

When not globe trotting, the Browns live in New York, where he works for ABC. Recently he left Mutual where he had worked for 13 years.

From his pleasant duplex apartment on 54th Street, just off 5th Avenue, Mr. Brown converses intensely and smoothly about his philosophy of commentating. Outside, the street noises of the city seem faint and distant as the tall (six feet three inches) gray-haired man says with meaningful clarity:

"Conveyors of information—to the very best of their ability—should interpret and and evaluate." Sometimes the jowls in his face shake slightly as he emphasizes a phrase.

"How objective is reporting?" he asks. "Mere selection and organization of news involves evaluation and judgment. Enough news comes over the wire for an announcer to speak continually for three hours. Cutting this down to a fifteen-minute or five-minute broadcast will automatically involve personal opinion and a point of view.

"The people can listen to and judge a reasonably balanced perspective, by having access to points of view," he continues in a quiet, determined voice. "And I insist on the right to give my point of view. I think it is not only a fundamental of commentating but I think it is what the American people—a free society—deserve to have."

Dear Ed:

I'm returning your film on the Mid-East. The Benton family looked at it and were instructed and greatly interested. Indeed, we resolved to break our family habits and to look at television next year for an hour and a half on the first Sunday of every month. We shall join your fans on your new series.

I congratulate you on this remarkable and difficult summary on the Mid-East. I happen to think you are showing how television can be used and should be used--in the great and full meaning of that hackneyed phrase "in the public interest, convenience and necessity."

I didn't know that Howard Smith was doing this kind of work for you. He is very effective. I have told you how likable I find him and his wife, and of the compliments I hear for his broadcast (to which I regretfully admit I do not listen).

Very sincerely yours,

Bill

Dear Bill:

Thanks for yours of October 11th.

I am glad that you agree with me about McCarthy's final speech. Unfortunately I don't know who wrote it, and do not feel that I am in a position to inquire of the Senator's office as to who is ghosting for him these days.

In case I don't see you before you take off for Russia, I take this opportunity of offering you my very best wishes.

Dear Ed:

I looked up the Nixon quote and I agree with you. In case you've forgotten, here is the New York Times' quotation in a story by Russell Baker:

"For another, 'divisive forces', which he said had hurt the party in 1954 have been 'dispelled'. Mr. Nixon said 'the so-called McCarthy controvery' was 'one of the major forces' that had split the party.

"He insisted that this was now 'out of the way', and Republican leaders were 'solidly lined up' behind the President.

"Then, the Vice President gave this interpretation of what he suggested had been Senator Joseph R. McCarthy's fatal error.

"There was, he said a political adage to the effect that 'you must not strike a king unless you kill him.'

"Politically', he said, 'you could say you must not strike a leader unless you destroy him. I think that our political history shows that when you have a great issue and an individual decides to take on the top man, if he wins out on the issue he gains in popularity, but when you make a frontal assault on somebody bigger, you'd better be sure you win. If you lose, you're through.'"

My secretary who looked this up for me commented, "Time Magazine didn't even carry the story."

Very sincerely yours,

P.S. I am grateful to you for calling my attention to McCarthy's speech of August 1. It is brilliantly written. Indeed this is the most brilliantly written, and in its way the most skillful, speech that I have ever read over McCarthy's name. Do you have any clue as to the writer? I have a special personal interest here. The same man may be working for Congressman Tom Dodd of Hartford. Congressman Dodd in a recent speech used identically the same figure of speech that McCarthy used on page 10888, top of the third column, in the Congressional Record--comparing the "friendship with the Russians" move by the Administration to the Mayor of Chicago inviting Al Capone to friendship. Perhaps you've heard that Congressman Dodd is a leading contender for the Senatorial nomination here in Connecticut in 1956.

It gives me pleasure to be able to send you our 1955 edition of the already famous new Britannica World Language Dictionary. I am enclosing some material which will tell you about this and which, I hope, may provoke you into using it.

You will see from this gift that I feel you are now old enough to be spending more time with your books - and this in turn will mean more time with your Dictionary.

In only two years, this new Dictionary has become one of the biggest selling books in the world. We anticipate an annual volume of about 100,000 sets mostly sold through our Britannica salesmen.

Please read the section in Volume Two which begins after page 1528 and runs through to page 1544. This is a much easier assignment than it sounds. (Most of it you can skip!)

With this comes my warmest wishes for a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Dear Ed:

I send you the attached letter even though I know you will look at it regretfully because it's so long. I send it to you because I know the subject matter is close to your heart. Put it aside until you have the five minutes required to read it and think about it. This ties back to our lunch of last week with Frank Stanton. You told me you would read Ned Rosenheim's previous letter and comment on it. This second one is the supplement, and it is even more pointed. Incidentally, I do not know Ned Rosenheim and when he reminds me that he met me at a President's Reception, circa 1938 - well, I only wish I had a good enough memory to remember the bright young men I met in 1938.

But I'm impressed with his two letters. I think you will be. They are dealing with a subject close to your heart long before you thought you might emerge.

That Lever job was indeed a top job. If you had taken it, now you wouldn't be exposed to these sideline problems. I'm glad you didn't take it. I have turned down all such "good" jobs myself.

As you know I can't ever really talk to you when there is someone else around. I'm going to be in New York constantly for five weeks, my first such five weeks in years. Maybe you can find time for a lunch with me. I'll promise not to talk to you about the University of Chicago. Or even about Fellowships or Ned Rosenheim, if this is your wish. Indeed, we will have to try hard to keep such things on our agenda.

Very sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Benton:

The carbon of your letter to Pat Pattullo was forwarded to me in this little town, where we're spending a few days putting our house in order for summer tenants. I'll be back in the office by Friday, but find the rustic atmosphere good for thinking about some of the questions raised by your report to Pat. I hope you'll excuse my presuming to send you these few random ideas; I do think the Fellowships can be valuable in a number of ways, and I'd love to see the University play a dominant, if not an exclusive role in the project.

I think my former letter to you anticipated the very real problem advanced by Mr. Murrow, namely, the question of restricting the Fellowships to a single university. The only answer, of course, is that the University of Chicago is uniquely able to provide a kind of experience that must be rather rigorously defined. It's not enough to assert the general excellence of Chicago in defense of restricting the fellowships to this one place. I think we must propose a program, specifically "tailor-made" to meet the needs of the Fellows and designed to exploit the superiority of the University in all appropriate areas.

The interdisciplinary committees I mentioned in my earlier letter might be the starting point. Since the term "institute" is fashionable and impressive, perhaps there could be a William Paley Institute of the University of Chicago. A permanent administrative and advisory staff could run the thing; this staff could include representative, distinguished teachers from a variety of fields, whose job would be initially to consult with each Fellow, establish his program of work, and provide supervision and counsel as his work progressed. At the same time, the Fellow would be encouraged to move freely among all areas relevant to the particular problem in which he was interested. It might well be possible for him to spend part of his year in places other than the University. If a man were interested in the folkways of Kansas crossroad towns, he could do "fieldwork" there; a student of theatrical techniques might well put in time on Broadway or in California; reading could be done at the best library for the purpose, wherever located. It is conceivable that the majority of the Fellow's year would be spent away from Chicago. This latitude could be accompanied by devices, however, which would keep the project a University affair, among them being liaison with a faculty adviser (advisers) as the Fellow's work progressed; some sort of terminal report on the project (possibly a public lecture or paper); occasional communal meetings of all Fellows for the discussion of matters of common interest (with perhaps distinguished visitors); and, above all, the fact that certain courses to be taken on campus would at some stage of the project--probably an early one--be almost indispensable.

As an example, suppose the producer or artist involved in a children's program were given a Fellowship at the Institute. Suppose he were interested in discovering the real needs among children of 3 to 5 which his program could attempt to fill, while remaining an attractive and entertaining show. His initial activity might include consultation with a Sch ol of Education person in order to establish a year's program of research and study. He might spend a quarter or two in courses in child psychology and that sort of thing, together with odd courses which might appeal to him in English or Anthropology or Art or whatnot. He might, at this point, also prepare himself for "fieldwork" with a course in statistics or psychometrics. Then he might spend 4 or 5 months visiting nursery schools and their teachers, or arranging and supervising home interviews about kids' TV habits, or talking to heads of childrens book departments, or librarians, or anything else that his problem dictated. In assessing his data, planning new explorations, stating his findings, he would be regularly helped by his adviser at the University. At infrequent intervals he might join in seminars or attend lectures with his fellow-Fellows. If his project were in pretty good shape at the end of his year, he could receive help and subsidy in publishing his results; if not, he might give an interim report in the shape of a public or quasi-public talk.

In other words, a serious person could draw upon funds rather generously supplied, upon the University's arsenal of experts, upon a great range of courses, laboratories, libraries, etc. in pursuit of questions and answers closely related to his professional concerns but which his work itself would never allow him to follow. To take even my own, very atypical case: it would be a great luxury to study the effect of a program like the Round Table--to receive help in defining precisely what I want to know from educators or philosophers, to be aided by statisticians, psychologists, and public opinion experts in setting up questionnaires by which I could discover whether people learn from or are persuaded by what they hear, to get an idea of the kind of folks who listen to such a program, and, ultimately, to allow my findings to shape the nature of the broadcast.

While this kind of thing would, unlike the Niemans, take people off-campus and allow them much freedom, I realize that there is a tighter, more "schoolmasterish" quality to this program than the gentle, free kind of "rewarding year on quadrangles" that was originally thought of. But without something pretty explicit without a uniquely and candidly academic approach, without, above all, the idea of a firm program which the U of C alone is prepared to offer, Murrow's point about the limitations imposed by attendance at a single school cannot, I think, be refuted. If Paley asks, "But why just the University of Chicago, or any university?" I think we must be prepared to answer that this University can supply precisely the kind of experience that such Fellows want and need and which will most benefit the broadcasting industry at large, that only our University is prepared to allow vast range in meeting the curiosity of the individual and, at the same time, to see that his problem is tackled with the care and expertise and planning that a great university alone can provide.

This all means that we're not only interested in establishing fellowships; much more, we're undertaking a new educational venture, designed for a particular--and important -kind of student. I don't know a thing about Mr. Paley, but if I were a rich gent, I think I'd be much more excited about founding a new, well-planned, firmly-principled kind of educational program than about merely endowing a certain kind of fellowship for a certain kind of person.

Quite apart from all the above, Pattullo may have told you an alternate suggestion I had, supposing the Fellowship thing were to be absolutely no-go. This would be for a lectureship, somewhat similar to the Walgreen affair. In this instance, though, a distinguished, senior figure in the broadcasting industry would be invited--at fat stipend--to spend a certain amount of time (6 weeks, a quarter, 2 quarters?) on campus, devoting his time to lectures, seminars or what have you. In some instances--Murrow is a conspicuous case in point--the value of the person would be that of a great newsman and analyst; in other cases, the good taste, technical knowledge, and general experience of the person would be what made him worthwhile, in a way analagous, I suppose, to the notion of a great theatrical personage taking up temporary residence. Even here in Chicago there are people like Judith Waller or Ben Park who could tell the University community a great deal about broadcasting and its public. I offer this possibility, not with wild enthusiasm, but as a modest alternative to the fellowships which might still achieve some of the ends we would seek in the other project.

You can certainly toss all the above in the wastebasket without feeling that you're doing more than disposing of the freeassociatin of one academic who would like most intensely to see communications and academic life brought more closely together.

A final word, as to thefinal Round Table. While I sympathize most thoroughly with the views John Howe expressed--and in which you concur, I simply could not, in all prudence, make the last program too much of an elgiac affair. Our listeners will know about the departure of the RT; they will have TV Smith in ~~any~~ I hope, a moderately nostalgic mood; I suspect they'll have a good program in "When Gown Talks to Town," since we'll try to air the whole question of what the academic can say to the layman--and how to say it., with special reference to the Round Table's efforts. I certainly don't want to go out on a limb about "Monitor," but, on the other hand, if it is a chance to do something good for a larger audience than the RT has had in years, we are determined to make the most of it. Meanwhile, efforts to resuscitate the RT go on, and if you get an SOS in this connection, don't be surprised.

Again, I apologize for writing at such length. Considering that I met you once (President's Reception, circa 1938), I seem to spill out my notions in extraordinary detail. But I am as aware of as I am grateful for your interest in our broadcasting affairs: My thanks and good wishes to you.

Sincerely,

Ned Rosenheim

Dear Mr. Benton:

I had hoped long before now to have met with you andto have had a chance to talk over a number of things, including the subject of the present letter. I am certain, though, that you are familiar with the rather wild state of affairs that has prevailed in the Radio Office of recent weeks. Not only have disturbing and possibly exciting future prospects kept me very busy but they have made the question of expanding our radio operations (as well as similar though quite disassociated thoughts about the Journal of General Education) appear to be a kind of luxury in the face of our current struggle for respectable survival. Needless to say, we are trying hard to make our appearance on NBC's Monitor service one of which neither the University nor the Round Table's old friends will be ashamed. At the same time there are efforts being made for the preservation of the Round Table in some form or another; indeed, I have not despaired of its appearing on television. And, finally, there is Chicago's Channel 11, which will actually be on the air in the fall and to which I hope our contribution will be substatial and useful.

At this point, however, I am writing you only about the possibility of a project involving fellowships for members of the broadcasting industry - - a project which I believe Pat Pattullo of the Development Office originally discussed with you and which he has asked me to explore. (The Development Drive, as you can see, seems to be taking precedence over everything else in all quarters.) As I understand Pattullo's account of the fellowship project, it would bear a rather firm analogy to the Nieman Fellowships at Harvard, which, I think we can assume, have been conspicuously successful in terms of the university, the Fellows, and the newspaper industry as a whole. I take it that the objectives sought in establishing similar fellowships for the broadcasting industry might be stated somewhat as follows:

1. To enrich and elevate the quality of Broadcasting in this country by providing personnel actively engaged in this industry with the insights, habits, and information uniquely available in a great university.

2. To recognize appropriately the accomplishments and the promise of able persons in this industry by making available the leisure and financial support necessary for the pursuit of a year's suudy in a great university.

3. To strengthen and clarify the relationship between the broadcasting industry and the most improtant centers of teaching and research which exist in our country today.

Beyond these general objectives there are special circumstances suggesting that fellowships of this sort would serve a peculiarly important purpose at this time. I need not labor the extent to which one of the greatest media for general communication and enlightenment has, in actuality, become essentially a source of entertainment, and I am sure that you know far better than I do the weaknesses and inadequacies which have, it seems to me, become even more apparent as television assumes a greater role in our national life.

The proposed fellowships would not, of course, be expected to transform broadcasting in any dramatic fashion. On the other hand, I cannot think of many more affirmative and hopeful steps than one in which responsible members of the broadcasting industry would be exposed to the habits, values, and problems which a great university is traditionally associated. To put it bluntly and rather personally: It would be nice to feel that the kind of responsible, inquiring, sensitive citizens we are traditionally concerned with producing in our College and "non-vocational" graduate programs were actually to be found in positions of authority in the radio and television business. The foregoing is perhaps a bit fatuous, but just the same I do not think these fellowships can be seen either as a period of leisurely browsing around the Midway on the one hand or, on the other, a mystical device whereby through mere exposure to the air on 58th Street, broadcasters will be turned into paragons of civic virtue. In short, I should think that we, at least, could view this as a genuine educational venture in which, by the exercise of principles to which the University is devoted, important people might have their habits and resourses importantly affected.

This is not the kind of rhetoric I suppose you or anyone else could use on a potential donor to a foundation which would provide such fellowships. My original three objectives would, in such a case, probably be more to the point. Beyond this there are, of course, such realistic considerations as the fact that the president of a broadcasting network, for example, would publicly appear in the role of an earnest and altruistic contributor to the enrichment of his own industry, the support of the University, and the reward of professional merit.

I have talked about this project in a very general way, mentioning no names of course, to a number of people engaged in radio and television. There are certain problems which tend to distinguish such a project from the Nieman Fellowships. Not the least of these is the fact that successful people in broadcasting, at a level comparable to that of the newspaperman who receives the Nieman Fellowships, are getting salaries far greater than those which newspapermen can ordinarily hope for, and would consequently not regard the kind of stipend the Nieman Fellowships present as anything other than a financial sacrifice. There are several ways out of this. The most obvious one is to provide a relatively small number of scholarships with a rather generous amount of money. Thus, if $30,000 annually were available, I should certainly argue for three at $10,000 rather than six at $5,000. I am informed by several people whose salaries are far larger than $10,000 a year that they would be happy to do with a good deal less in return for the honor and prestige of a year at this University, but there is a certain point (and I judge it to be about $10,000) below which they would consider themselves on starvation wages. There are, of course, people in lower echelons in the broadcasting industry for whom a much smaller stipend might still be attractive, but the question here is whether such people have sufficiently distinguished themselves to merit fellowships awarded on essentially the same basis as the Nieman grants. It is, of course, conceivable that we could frankly award the fellowships on the basis of promise rather than past performance. Here the rub, I am told, would be that in the fiercely competitive and uncertain circumstances in which youthful aspirants operate in broadcasting, very few people would be willing to leave their jobs for the period of a year.

Both of these problems, that of finances and that of job security, might be solved if the fellowships carried with them sufficient prestige; certainly the fact that at the going rates the Guggenheim Grants have no want of applicants suggests that a certain kind of person at any rate is willing to make sacrifices for the honor of such a fellowship. And as to tenure, if the fellowship were regarded with sufficient respect I am sure that, under any circumstances, it would be considered an asset to the career of a young person in radio or television. Another thing to be remembered, of course, is that both the financial question and that of uncertain tenure are probably far less acute in local stations in the smaller communities than they are in Radio City or the Merchandise Mart. And I certainly would hope that fellowships would go in substantial measure to the people doing a fine job away from the big cities. (In my present frame of mind, induced by the mass-migrations to New York, I'd just as soon see all of them go elsewhere.)

Another question which has been raised repeatedly has to do with the job areas of the broadcasting industry from which the fellows would be drawn. Most logically, and closest to the Nieman example, the fellowships would go to those engaged in news and public affairs, whether writers, commentators, producers, or other administrative personnel. Since, with few exceptions, people engaged in this end of the business do not receive salaries comparable to those of "commercial" personnel, this might also be helpful in meeting the financial questions already raised. On the other hand, I should think that anyone involved in the broadcasting industry, including those engaged in production, announcing, acting, music, and other administrative and technical activities, should probably be eligible. Quite frankly - - and this is a matter of my own personal opinion-I do not think that the greatest infirmity of the broadcasting industry is its indifference to news values or moral standards or the public good. It lies, to my mind, in a certain pervasive tastelessness. I am not very worried about television turning my kids into delinquents but I am quite concerned about the chances of their becoming boobs, on whose imagination and capacity for joy "Howdy Doody" sets the limits. I think, therefore, it would be a great shame if these fellowships were exclusively to go to commentators, to study Political Science. The prospect of people engaged in producing children's programs or commercial drama being exposed to a year's study in the Humanities strickes me as equally improtant.

Another inevitable question is the real usefulness of the fellowships. If they are to be more than a year's leisure, can the University provide courses of study that seem to the Fellows relevant and exciting? A friend of mine who is a successful executive producer for one of the networks wrote this to me: "I can see why you would like to push these as University fellowships, but if I were about to provide a grant in my own name, the notion of providing, say, a year's travel abroad, or freedom to study wherever or however one wants, including purely technical developments in the television industry, would seem more attractive than a year in a single prescribed University." The answer to this one, I suppose, lies in a firm insistence that this University successfully can provide what is uniquely and urgently needed by the industry - - that the sense of rigor, responsibility, inquiry, and broadmindedness can be better cultivated here than anywhere else. It would, therefore, have to be argued, I judge, that a fellowship in this University peculiarly meets the needs of the industry and the individual recipient. I think that such a case could be made, even though it would eliminate some of the latutude in curricular choice which, I'm told, is one of the nice features of the Nieman grants. You remember our various inter-departmental and even inter-divisional committees, established to cut-across all sorts of conventional curricular boundaries and to open the whole range of the University's courses to the graduate student whose problem requires real interdisciplinary work. But even with this latitude, the problem can be - - and is - - clearly defined, the program established with care, and sustained, expert counsel provided. I think such a committee-device might be the thing for these fellowships; it would make them appear more systematic, tailor-made, yet congenial.

To make the fellowships a really significant educational venture, they would obviously have to be granted to those who not only had demonstrated competence in their vocational specialty, but could provide evidence that their aptitudes and inclinations fitted them for this type of experience. I assume that applications, interviews, and similar devices would be employed; that is, that fellowships would be granted to those who specifically applied for them, rather than as unsolicited rewards. I should hope that the fellowships might still be publicized in a way which invited the public to consider them as coveted and honorable prizes, rather than as mere grants-in-aid to those eager to advance their education.

All the foregoing hardly constitutes a "prospectus" for such a project. It does incorporate some of the points, pro and con, that I've been able to collect from rather thoughtful but typical people in the broadcasting business, as well as a few earnest if inept notions of my own, as a teacher in the University. If there is additional spade-work, inquiry, or musing with which I can help you, I hope, sir, you will let me know. And I hope, too, that before long I can talk with you about some of the numerous and doubtless more genuinely improtant, questions that the University faces in its broadcasting activity.

ER well

In the meantime, I send you my warmest good wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Edward W. Rosenheim, Jr.

Dear Ed:

I owe my latest knowledge about you to the newspaper strike. This morning I bought the Herald Tribune rather than the Times. My wife read aloud to me John Crosby's column "Murrow Comes to the Rescue." I send my congratulations to you and over your shoulder to John Crosby whom I met last summer in France.

When I saw Bob Kintner last week and complained about the networks' abject surrender to McCarthy, he defended it and boasted about being the first. I agree wholly with Crosby. I suppose I ought to demand time to answer McCarthy.

Ed, I'm leaving today for Paris for Christmas with my children. In after years when they enjoy their knowledge of French they can always say, "we owe this to Daddy's defeat."

I'm going to check in with you in January on my return. I remember we've promised to lunch together.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE DR. LOUIS C. KRESS

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, last week the Nation lost, through death, one of the greatest exponents of cancer education, Dr. Louis C. Kress, director of the Roswell Park Memorial Institute at Buffalo, N. Y.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a short statement which I have prepared concerning Dr. Kress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR IVES

Dr. Louis C. Kress was on his way to Rochester to make a speech on cancer research, one of thousands he had made before lay and professional groups over a period of 28 years, when he suffered a heart attack. An indication of the respect in which he was held by professional circles is the fact that the meeting in Rochester—a meeting of the Rochester Pharmaceutical Association—was scheduled for 10:30 in the evening so that all Rochester pharmacists could hear the famed cancer fighter after closing their drug stores.

Ironically, Dr. Kress died before he could see the fruition of his fondest dream—the completion of the expansion of Roswell Park Memorial Institute, which is the center for cancer research and treatment in upstate New York. Dr. Kress had fought for many years to have the institute expanded and had carefully planned every laboratory, operating room, and piece of equipment.

Dr. Kress in his lifetime set an example which may well become legendary in the field of cancer research. At the age of 28, he gave up a lucrative medical practice to devote his life to fighting cancer. In recalling that decision, he once told a reporter that he and his wife had made up their minds to forego big cars and mink coats and country clubs for the rest of their lives. And Dr. Kress then went on to become, in New York State, the leading light in the long hard task of educating people on cancer and pushing the much-needed research projects. Only last month the American Cancer Society selected Dr. Kress as recipient of its first annual award for important contributions to the control of cancer.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD, in connection with my statement, the text of an editorial entitled "Life of Devoted Service," which appeared in the Buffalo Evening News, of March 14, 1952.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIFE OF DEVOTED SERVICE

In the death of Dr. Louis C. Kress, director of the Roswell Park Memorial Institute, there passed a man who made important contributions to the alleviation of human suffering. Practically all his professional career was given to the study of malignant diseases. He was a leader in the fight again cancer; he promoted research in the nature and cause of this dread disease, research looking to the discovery of an eventual cure for it. He was recognized nationally and internationally as an authority in this field of medical science.

Dr. Kress was long associated with the State Institute for the Study of Malignant Diseases, from which the Roswell Park Memorial Institute developed. His work there brought him appointment as director of the Division of Cancer Control of the New York State Department of Health. His selection as director of the enlarged institute here, which is in process of development as one of the greatest centers of cancer research and treatment in the Nation, followed as a matter of course. Unhappily, he could not live to see the project for the enlargement of its facilities completed.

No man has done more than did Dr. Kress to promote public education with respect cancer—to spread information regardin manifestations of it and so get an early diagnosis. Thus the lives of a great many persons were saved, for cancer often can be cured if it is discovered in good time. He always was available for addresses before groups of citizens who wished to know something about the disease. He preached the gospel of hope in early diagnosis. He lectured at medical schools and before medical societies in this country and Canada on the findings of cancer research. For his devoted service he was cited by the University of Buffalo, and he received the first annual award of the American Cancer Society, New York State Division.

Cancer remains largely a mystery, but real headway has been made by scientists like Dr. Kress in combatting it. They and their successors will continue research until the mystery of it is pierced and it takes its place among the generally recognized curable diseases. There is no commensurate reward for men like Dr. Kress; they must find it within themselves. They light the way, step by step, for eventual conquest of the scourge of cancer. Dr. Kress will long be held in grateful remembrance for his devoted service for mankind.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and ask the indulgence of the Senate.

The day before yesterday, on the Nation-wide television program See It Now, Senator MCCARTHY made a charge against me wholly at variance with the facts.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does t Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BENTON. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Inasmuch as th Senator's remarks evidently have to d with another Senator, I suggest the ab sence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does th Senator from Connecticut yield for tha purpose?

Mr. BENTON. Unless I have to yield for that purpose, I do not yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not have to yield for any purpose.

Mr. BENTON. Then, I decline to yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut may proceed.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, thi television program is under the directic of the internationally famous broadcaster and commentator, Mr. Edward Murrow. I suspect that he is more embarrassed and distressed about this abuse of his broadcast than anyone else can possibly be. Mr. Murrow ha achieved a reputation for objectivity and for truthful reporting. He is esteemed as one of the two or three most eminent commentators in the history of broadcasting. He would never wilfully or willingly give time on his program for the dissemination of false and misleading charges against any individual—even against a United States Senator.

Senator McCARTHY's statement on this program I shall now read. I shall take nothing out of the context. At my request the Columbia Broadcasting System transcribed the statement from its kinescope recording. I shall quote everything they sent me, even though the first part of it may not seem very relevant. There can be no denial in this case of the accuracy of the transcript, as there has been by the junior Senator from Wisconsin of the accuracy of the newspaper reports, and the sworn affidavits of radio officials, on his famous speech of February 9, 1950, at Wheeling, W. Va. Here is the transcript:

Mr. MURROW. A lot of people have said that you have smeared them and you have said recently you have been smeared. This raises the whole question of the rights and privileges of an ordinary citizen or a Senator before an investigating committee. What do you think ought to be done about that, Senator?

Mr. McCARTHY. What do I think ought to be done about what, Ed?

Mr. MURROW. About the protection of the rights of an individual citizen who may be called before a congressional committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. If a man is called before a committee and tells the truth—it is only the man who has something to cover up—the man who is perjuring himself—he has much to worry about.

Mr. MURROW. Then you feel if you should be called before an investigating committee you will have nothing to worry about?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have been called in.

Mr. MURROW. Do you expect to be called again?

Mr. McCARTHY. I don't know.

Mr. MURROW. Tell me this, Senator McCARTHY, how do you feel on the subject of congressional immunity?

Mr. McCARTHY. Congressional immunity, like many other necessary parts of our Republic, you understand, Ed, can be abused, has been abused, many times. You understand that the idea of congressional immunity originated way back in England when the representatives of the people couldn't freely speak their minds for fear of being hung by the king. Today we have congressional immunity, not for the benefit of the Senators, but for the benefit of the public, so they may get the facts. I have before me a document which I think displays the rather humorous attitude of some Senators about congressional immunity. I have the testimony of BILL BENTON, Connecticut's mental midget before the committee. At that time he was speaking on the congressional immunity, objecting because I used congressional immunity to expose Communists. This was handed to the press and we find the following: "No part of this must be used by the press until it becomes immune as I testified." So you find the Senator shouting and screaming to high heaven "McCARTHY shouldn't use congressional immunity to expose Communists." But he is using congressional immunity to smear McCARTHY.

Mr. MURROW. What do you think is going to happen in the Wisconsin primaries?

Mr. McCARTHY. Ed, I don't know. It is too early to predict.

Mr. President, now what are the facts? The facts are that I presented testimony to the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections totaling something like 30,000 words. I could not know that the committee would sit both morning and afternoon—incidentally, with all members present—and would finish up the hearing of my testimony in 1 day. If the committee had not met in the afternoon, my testimony could not have been completed. If the committee had consumed more time in asking questions, or by statements of individual committee members, the hearings would have gone over to a second day and perhaps even a third day.

Most assuredly I should not have released my full 30,000 words of testimony, prior to the hearings, or even at their beginning. If I had, the committee could have read in the newspapers, prior to its presentation, the material which I intended to present to it. I suggest that this would have been regarded by many as discourteous on my part. Further, it would have violated traditional procedures.

Now, what was the statement made to the press when my testimony was given out? I shall read it in full. It is the only statement that accompanied my testimony. It was written and signed by Stan Allen, my administrative assistant, and an experienced newspaperman:

Caution: The attached testimony of Senator WILLIAM BENTON, of Connecticut, scheduled for delivery before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections of the Rules Committee of the Senate starting at or about 9:30 a. m., Friday, September 28, 1951, must be held in strict confidence for release as it becomes a part of the record of the subcommittee. No portion, synopsis, or intimation must be given out, published or broadcast, except under the conditions herein set forth.

Please guard against premature publication or announcement.

It will be noted that there is no reference here of any kind to any desire of mine for immunity. The Senate, I am sure, will agree that this statement is perfectly routine handling. It is designed to protect the press, which is itself concerned with the problem of libel. It seeks to deal fairly both with the press and the members of the committee.

Mr. President, there is a second glaring error in Senator McCARTHY's remarks of last Sunday to Mr. Murrow and to some millions of his listeners. In view of the record, I think I am justified in assuming this was a calculated error. Senator McCARTHY quoted me as objecting to his use of congressional immunity and claimed that I had—to use his words—"shouted and screamed to high heaven" about his abuse of immunity. The fact is that nowhere in my testimony did I object to his use of immunity. What I did, in my case No. 6, was to show that he had deceived the Senate with respect to his intentions regarding immunity.

I showed that on February 20, 1950, when he was challenged, on the floor he replied—without any qualification:

I will not say anything on the Senate floor which I will not say off the floor. On the day when I take advantage of the security we have on the Senate floor, on that day I will resign from the Senate.

Exactly 2 months later, at the conclusion of a speech before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Senator McCARTHY was again challenged, this time by one of the editors. He replied:

One of your questions is: "Will you make the statement in public?" The answer is "No." No. 2, "Are you going to resign?" The answer is "No." O. K.?

Mr. President, what I was shouting and screaming to high heaven about—if you will pardon the quotation—was not immunity but honesty.

The Senate may recall that after Senator McCARTHY launched his sensational attacks on the State Department in Wheeling, he followed up the next day with a second attack in Salt Lake City.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. BENTON. Do I have a choice, Mr. President?

Mr. BRIDGES. I suggest that the Senator from Connecticut is out of order. He referred to the honesty of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will have to take his seat if challenged by any Senator.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senator from Connecticut be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. BRIDGES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, do I have to yield for that purpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that when this question is raised any Senator has the right to make the point of no quorum. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] moved that the Senator from Connecticut be allowed to proceed in order. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Dear Senator Benton:

I am replying to your letter of July 12th merely to tell you that it won't be possible for Mr. Murrow to be your interviewer for the Italian film since he is on his way to Korea.

He went off the air for the summer on July 7. At the moment, he is in Seattle and will leave there tomorrow morning for Tokyo.

I shall tell him of your request when he returns in the fall. I know he will be sorry he wasn't available.

Sincerely yours,

Dorothy McDonough

Dear Ed:

Yes, this would be a substantial favor, but it wouldn't take you much time.

Paul Hoffman's men in Italy took something like 18 minutes of film for me. The best of it will be incorporated with other ECA Italian films. We might come out with a 15 minute reel. I want the film to show to groups in Connecticut--such as the Sons of Italy Lodges, etc. I don't expect any showings outside of Connecticut, and I'm sure there won't be any commercial showings.

Now here is my favor.

Could you take between half an hour and an hour with me some day after July 24--and I will of course be happy to come to New York in order to make this easy for you--and would you act as my interviewer? I am of course assuming that the script is wholly satisfactory to you.

I shall accept this from you as a most generous campaign contribution!

Ed, I know that you may be dead set against favors of this kind, and I shall understand it wholly if you tell me I am presumptuous in suggesting it.

Very sincerely yours,

Bill Benton

MEMORANDUM

TO: SENATOR BENTON

FROM: FRANK CELLIER

SUBJECT: ITALIAN FILM

As I have mentioned to you, it seems to me that a very effective film can be contrived out of the footage recording your trip to Italy supplemented by ECA footage dealing with reconstruction in Italy. The film could be given quite considerable impact by ~~fomenting~~ formating it as an interview which some well-known news commentator has with you. In this connection, you have suggested Edward R. Murrow as an excellent choice.

The most important problem facing us is that of time. An aspect of this problem is the fact that the ECA footage is in 16 mm. whereas your trip footage is in 35 mm. A certain amount of laboratory work which I need not detail will have to be done before we can get at the actual editing.

I have just discussed the project with Scott Fletcher and he agrees with me that the most expeditious procedure would be for me to take the film materials back to Wilmette with me at the end of this week and for us to cut the film together in Wilmette as rapidly as possible. At the same time, we will also script both the interview and the narration. The narration will, of course, follow out of the interview and will actually be the extended replies you give to appropriate questions which Murrow will ask you from time to time.

With the film cut to an open-end pattern and the script ready, the next step will be photographing the interview. This could be scheduled to take place immediately after the cutting and scripting are finished. I estimate that the shooting can be tentatively scheduled for the week of July 24th if it is possible for you to be in New York at that time.

The final release of the film hinges in large part on the speed with which the pre-print materials of the ECA films can be gotten from Italy to us in Wilmette. This point I will check into specifically on Wednesday the 12th; and before I leave Washington I shall write you a follow-up memorandum concerning my estimate of the final release date.

Dear Bill:

The picture has been dispatched to the lovely Lieutenant. It would have been sent earlier, but I have just returned from a week on the West Coast where folks are a lot less hysterical than they are here.

I'll be in Washington for the next two or three weeks. If you have a luncheon date free, perhaps your secretary would give me a ring.

Dear Ed:

How many fans do you have like this? I met a girl who claims she's so crazy about you that she can't leave home, until eight o'clock. She even says that all her friends know of this secret longing. Indeed, in listening to her, I have decided that you are mis-cast as a news broadcaster. You should be singing love lyrics.

Now the important thing is that this girl is an important girl. She runs all the beautiful nurses at Bethesda Hospital. So if you are ever sick in Washington you will want to know her--if you want a beautiful nurse. Besides that she is beautiful herself.

I am speaking of Lieutenant Roseanne Flanagan, no less. And she has told me that she will love me from now until the ends of the earth--after she receives from you an autographed picture.

Please send it, and be sure to enscribe it with love and kisses, to her at Bethesda Naval Hospital, from which I have just escaped--after a siege of pneumonia.

Dear Bill:

Thanks for yours of September 13th. I admire Chet and wish him well, but I am not registered in Connecticut and moreover, I don't believe that guys doing the kind of job I am should make campaign contributions unless they want to do what Averell Harriman did and contribute to both sides as a hedge which is even more contemptible than not contributing at all.

I am just back from a hectic week in Berlin and would like to buy your lunch whenever you are free.

Dear Ed:

I am writing this letter to thirty-five people, all of them friends of Chet Bowles or mine.

You doubtless know that Chet is running for Governor in Connecticut. I didn't think he should do it. I think he felt the same way. But when forty-one of the forty-six key Democratic leaders of the State insisted that he take the nomination, he accepted.

Chet tells me, "I probably would still have refused if it hadn't been for an attack of conscience. I have been continually preaching that if people like ourselves are unwilling to take an active interest, we shouldn't complain if government is ridden with narrow political thinking and occasional shoddy practices".

Surprisingly enough, to me anyway, Elmo Roper says Chet has a chance to win, even though a slim one. Everyone seems to agree that he will run well ahead of the ticket. Even if he loses I hope that Chet will emerge from the campaign with his interest in public life unimpaired, and will continue to develop as a potentially important national figure.

You may be interested in the attached story which ran in George Waldo's Bridgeport Post, a strongly Republican paper.

Chet's campaign problem is money. He figures he needs $100,000 minimum. It is generally understood that his opponent will spend five times that sum.

Chet is quickly coming to the end of his rope on financing himself personally. I want to help him and I intend to give to him generously according to my standards, even though I am registered in Connecticut as an independent and have never been politically active in either party.

It occurred

It occurred to me that you might possibly want to join me. Surely at this time, in this year of 1948, it is a good thing for the nation to keep men of Chet's integrity and ability active in public and political life.

I'm told that Chet's radio broadcasts are already making a strong impression in the State. A fifteen minute broadcast costs nearly $1,000 for a group of Connecticut stations.

If you want to join me in helping Chet, you can send a check made out to the "Bowles for Governor Club - Douglas Bennet, Treasurer" directly to him at Essex, Connecticut, or, if you prefer, send it to me and I will make the amount available to the Club.

Dear Rem:

This is my first day back in the shop, and I hasten to answer yours of November 17th. It occurs to me that something in the nature of an examination of the credentials of those of us who regurgitate our prejudices under the title of news analysis might be useful. I do not know Charles Kinsolving well enough to have an opinion as to whether he could do it. In short, I am for full disclosure not only so far as the news is concerned, but so far as those who manipulate it.

I fear there is no chance of my coming to the West Coast in the near future.

Dear Ed:-

We earnestly hope, and feel assured, that you are well through this bout with pneumonia and are again full restored to health. I wish very much that you could take off some time and come out here and enjoy this peaceful place — peaceful on the surface and so b autiful, but full of potent understanding and vision and awakened people, alert to the situation and wanting to do something about it! I could certainly amplify that comment!

An idea has been running through my mind which I would like to explore with you! It is a book, with TV overtones, perhaps, in some degree following the kind of drive which emanated from the lamented ~~in~~ Ward Wheelock and his "This I Believe" in which you, — and thanks — engaged me!

This is it; into our homes there come daily, by TV, radio, magazine, newspaper, etc. contemporary prophets and pundits. We listen, look, ponder, and wonder what they are like and how competent are they to sound forth as they do on matters political, social, intellectual, spiritual, etc. When good old Amos came up from the desert to Bethel, to say his piece, he was strongly convinced that he spoke for God Alimghty. These comments he made were not unlike some that come from the contemporary commentators.

So, Why not? Why not a book, done, let us say by our former associate Max Schuster and his partners, which might be entitled, "Pundits and Prophets, Modern Style!" Maybe ~~something~~ something like, "Painted Windows" which Strachey did many years ago of the British divines.

Who? Walter Lippman, Edward R. Murrow, Howard K. Smith, John Daly, Drew Pearson, Walter Kronkite, Eric Severeid, Roscoe Drummond, Joseph Harsch, The Alsop Brothers, and many others.

I wrote a letter on the subject the other day to DeWitt Wallace. It might be something for the Readers Digest. Also my new neighbor, who is chuck full of beans, Charles Kinsolving, now retired after 35 years in the purveying of news through UP, Newsweek, and many other instruments, could do such a job, I believe. I think I could help him.

Anyway, what about it Ed?

Helen jojns in ever vivid friendly feeling for you and Janet, and best wishes. She has recently come through a very unpleasant operation but has fully recovered, I am very glad to say.

Blessings on you and yours!

As ever

Dear Larry:-

Some observations, continuing our queries as to "What is Christianity?" and "Where does it fit into the present tension filled, highly potential modern world"!

It looks very much, mindful of the recent political campaign and the religious controversy which arose, mindful of the fact that one of the candidates is a professing Roman Catholic, and that he is now the President-elect of this Republic, that the subject of religion, in all its institutions and in reference to our national liberties and striving, shall be, as it has not been for some time, very much to the fore!

It might seem that Roman Catholicism is trapped by its basic dogma that binds it. That dogma is that what is pronounced by the Church at any time is binding on all and everywhere! The Protestant churches are also bound by the basic dogma, that "The rule of God as contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament is the only rule that God has given us whereby we may know him and enjoy him forever." With some exceptions, namely the Unitarians and the Universalists, the Christian churches Eastern and Western, are bound by the doctrines of Redemption; namely that by reason of the disobedience of Adam, a curse rests upon all mankind, but an atonement was provided in the sacrifice of Christ, while sufficient for all mankind is applied only to those in whom God has implanted faith. From Paul, through Augustine, and on to Calvin and other reformers this doctrine enchains!

This morning, I am going over some notes in my book here, which I will copy down for the record as I turn the leaves. In good time we shall go over all these documents and comments and see where we come out!

This one, which started the day. It is in the closing pages of Harnack's "What is Christianity?" He is commenting on Luther.

"He was not abreast of the knowledge accessible even in his own time. The naive age had gone by; it was an age of deep feeling, of progress, an age in which religion could not avoide contact with the power of the mind!" Pause a moment and think of that observation. How much more applicable it is at this moment to the present situation of the expansion of knowledge and the shrinking of the world and the tremendous possibilities of our times!

I listened last evening to a kind of debate between two of the great physicists who have been engaged in nuclwnar studies, one of whom is primarily responsible for the hydrogen bomb; Teller and Szilard. They were batting back and forth their opinions concerning further experiments in testing and also the question of disarmament! This morning, with the comments very much in mind, as I have written I was reading these lectures of my former teacher. This sentence came staring at me in the last pages;

"Here a tremendous task confronts us, and in the measure in which we accomplish it, shall we be able to answer with a better heart the deepest of all questions; the question of the meaning of life!"

In the consideration of the degree in which our Western nations and Western civilization generally, may be properly characterised as Christian, we should obviously explore Christian faith, Christian history, Christian doctrines and try to find out how far they have penetrated the behavior of people, of nations, in all the aspects of their culture, and their relations with one another and other peoples on this planet.

We should look at the sayings and commandments of Jesus, or as they may be attributed to him. We should consider the admonisitions, claims, exhortations and commandements throughout the New Testament, and those in the Old Testament which have found their way into the creedal requirements of the Christian churches. It is evident in doing so, we are going over ground which has been examined again and again through the ages. Perhaps it has never been done with the power now available in the "Open Mind", the tremendous accumulation which is ours of the disciplines of knowledge and the knowledge gleaned, now with the pressing necessities upon us in the conflicts and controversies and with the power facing us of the Soviet philosophy and practice and intention where the place of religion in all i s forms is completely alien and is regarded as part of the Western "imperialism" which must and will be swept away!

Now you, my friend, are obviously deeply interested in such matters — who isn't? — and you approach the same quite objectively and uninvolved in creeds or dogmas! In some measure you are concerned with the recent institution known as "Religious Science". May it not be the formation of another church, containing and excluding!

I can see where this whole matter could well be studied as the very special project of this institution. Of all fields of human behavior certainly there is none more pressing and important than the study of the meaning of life and the claims of religions for its fulfillment!

What is "Religious Science" Larry? Is it an experience to be tested? Is it an inquiry, a method, another religious movement concerned with physical health? Has it developed its own ceremonies, rituals, basic demands of its followers? Is it sufficiently removed from pre-conceptions to consider with the available technics of the exact sciences the subject of religion in the modern world?

Such subjects as these; (1) The origin of religion (2) The psychological factors in religious experience, (3) The comparison of world religions, (4) The origins of the Christian religion, (5) Christian institutions, history, creeds, and the present situation of the Christian churches, (6) What is meant by the "Indwelling Spirit", the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, Christ in you, and Revelation etc? (7) How is it to-day as to the Christian churches and politics, the arts, economics, health, science, international conflicts, and so on...

Consider the possibility that The Dutch School may be right and that it is true what Arthur Drews said; the whole tale of the life and sacrifice of the historic Jesus is a myth. Let us explore — you and your religious scientists — the opinion held by Drews and others that the myth of Jesus came about from many currents; fear, Hellenic "earth religions", Phrygian legends, Jewish Babylonian, even Indian and Persian.

Magna

These Dutch scholars declared that at the time of theemerging of Christianity, it is quite understandable that such a "cultus" should so emerge. The life stories accepted by the followers of various contemporary cults of their "gods" were very similar. What we know is very limited, because much of the record was destroyed and the interpretation which exists is largely within the writings of the church "fathers". But there were ~~many~~ cults of Adonis, Mthras, ~~Gilgamesh~~ Dionysos, Isis, Apollonius of Tyana, the Mage Mater, and certainly going way back the tales of Gilgamesch and Tammus. Also the wordsattributed to Jesus contained many stories, parables, pronouncements, admonitions which were incirculation in the Jewish communities, and many of them uttered by the Rabbinical sejolars. And son on.

To bring this morning's "meditation" to a close let me make these observations. As I look back over my years, I am well aware that I have had an experience with Christian churches, schools, leaders, courts, seminaries of instruction, and really I suppose thousands of ministers and many priests. I majored in Western History from early years, especially in church history at the Seminary, won a fellowship, studied under several "great masters", taught and wrote somewhat on the subject, was President of the Church Council of Los Angeles, and also President for a quarter century of a church founded college. I was for a time for the American Association of Colleges, inspector of Catholic colleges seeking admission. I have followed many heresy trials, and have known and respected many Christian ministers, liberal and conservative, who have sought with what has seemed to me, complete devotion to live by their faith in the service of mankind and inspired by the example of the historic Jesus.

But this also, As I have visited the homes of many ministers, I have observed that there were very few books in their libraries other than devotional ones, and very superficial ones largely slanted. The average clergyman is so taken up with the pressings needs of his parish and the jobs of his church organization, and limited funds available, so that I think it might be honestly stated that he has had little opportunity to read, consider such matters as I have enumerated, nor has he lived in an atmosphere stimulating for him to do so!

I must ~~[illegible]~~ close, but I wish some such institution as Religious Science would assemble these strange and really frightening documents which have come to me through the mail, full of bitter comments concerning the Roman Catholic Church, the man who is now President Elect, and in a wierd way mixing up Protestant fundamentalism and our National Liberties!

Remember the Scopes Trial!

"What is Christianity?" What is its place in our contemporary society?"
"What is the meaning of life?"

As we travel in the infinite spaces of the universes, and hold in our hands the instruments for life's obliteration on this planet, may there be some among us who consider what and where is God, if there be a god, and what is required of us, and how we may know and how we may do what is expected of us"

Dear Larry:-

In this morning's Chronicle I have just read that in the mob at New Orleans, as these little negro children passed into the school, part of the symbolic desegregation, a woman in the mob cried out that the judge who was responsible should be hanged by his toes! I wonder if in this Christian nation she is a professing Christian. How these events with their pictures supply the Soviets with most effective propaganda. Very sad.

This morning I am re-reading Betrand Russell's "Why I am not a Christian". It has much meat in it! He is a cocky old guy and certainly no one to be laughed off. In some pages, he seems quite as dogmatic in his disbelief as some of these believers in their way. But I am with him completely when he says; "The good life is one inspired by love and guided by knowledge".

Also he is very right in his comments concerning the reported saying of the historic Jesus that some of them are, for those so inspired and so guided, pretty bad. Certainly such a statement as this is not very uplifting; "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell." Did he say it? If he did say it, how does it fit in with the commandment that "ye are to love one another even as I have loved you!.

When he says that all Religion is based on fear, it is not enough to get mad at him, and cry with the Red Queen, "Off with his head". We should consider this statement. You with your Institute of Metaphysics and your comrades in religious science, what do you do with such a statement?

Certainly as we delve into the past and get close to the primitive we find that life for most was one of fairly constant fear. Discuss the matter with the social anthropoligists, and read objective books like Ruth Benedict's "Culture Patterns".

There was fear of the unpredictable forces of nature, of ~~owns~~ our own inadequacies, fear of imagined hostile beings that had come to take on a kind of reality, fear of the dark, and other child fears that remained with the adult, fear of death and of what might happen, (Satan, Lucifer, The devil, etc), fear for one's dear ones and what might happen to them, fear of inherited disabilities, fear of the angry ones with whom one might be regarded as outside the pale, (These little children in New Orleans, how frightened they must have been!) fear for the job, for the possibility of poverty, (how many very rich people are burdened with that one!)

Certainly Earl Russell is right when he finds that religion as an institution and in varkous forms has used fear to keep thepeople in line, and that includes the Christian institutions, and it is quite understandable that he should view organised religion as he does!

But there is something, so it seems to me, beyond the ranges of physics and chemistry, time, space, and the vasty universe, call it what you will, which is manifested in the loving heart and the searching mind, which we may not prove, but which we seek and hope is there and able in our need, in our desperate need in these strange and tortured and yet so potential days for the good life of love and knowledge!

Dear Ed!
I hope you are well again!!
Warm regards
Ken

THE READERS DIGEST
Pleasantville, Westchester County
New York

My dear Mr. Wallace:-

Several years ago, I had the privilege of acting as consultant to Ward Wheelock and Ed Murrow in selecting people to tell "What they believed". These statements were given over the radio and also published in several books. The estimated listeners and readers numbered many millions.

You may recall that Ward was enroute to Europe in his yacht planning additional statements in other lands. His yacht disappeared somewhere off the Caribbean Islands and there has never been discovered a trace of it or any knowledge of what happened.

Yesterday at luncheon at the Old Capital Club, when there were present Charles Kinsolving, whom you know, Gus Olson retired former Regent of the University of California, Larry Barretto, author and myself, this subject came to the fore and I wish you could have been present!

Someone said; "Why not a broadcast, and a book on some such subject as "Pundits and Prophets; Modern Style". These commentators who come into our homes via the radio, the TV screen, the newspapers and the magazines, have much to do in forming our opinions and guiding this nation. What do we know about them. Why don't you, Charles, produce a book, something like Strachey's "Painted Windows" in which adequate biographies appear of these contemporary prophets and pundits."

Such men as Walter Lippman, Edward R. Murrow, Drew Pearson, Chet Huntley, The Alsops, Howard K. Smith, Arthur Krock, David Lawrence, E. B. White, Ernest K. Lindley, and others. It would be good to know who they really are, and what may be their competence to spread their prophecies and state their interpretation of what is going on.

So it went on..... Why not get in touch with DeWitt Wallace, or Max Schuster, or Ben Hibbs, or Ordway Tead and ask them what they think of such a book.

So, I said I would write to you and to Ordway Tead who is a friend of mine. And so I do.

Charles Kinsolving, after some 35 years in the great Babylon of New York has come among us to live. You know his record. Let me enclose a cute poem whic he put together recently for his friends. Refresh your mind on his record in "Who's Who?" Do you think this would be a good idea to explore?

Dear Jim:-

I was very sorry that I had to leave the meeting of the committee when I did! But I know you understand. Helen had just come back from a periodic visitation at John Gratiot's office and was alone in the house. I gave her your very kind regards.

It seemed as if we were getting on with the adaptation of the articles of incorporation and the by-laws. Such doing will enable the foundation to widen its horizon and do what such community foundations are now doing all over the United States!

Certainly it should be made very clear tha the first job, which the foundation has set for itself, and in which it has directly and indirectly accomplished a nkble task, is the preserving and restoring of the historic adobes. But now, in addition, it can make clear to the community its competence to act in receiving and dispensing funds for worthy community purposes of broad philanthropic concern, and when it is widely known our experience here will, undbubtedly be as it is in other communities.

What I have set for myself as a job, I want to do in 1961, is make a study of possible coordination of foundations having similar purposes and thereby avoid overlapping and perhaps accomplish more effectively the purposes intended.

Attached are some additional papers which should be in the Foundation file. I certainly recommend that all plans in the adaptation of the Foundation to such a larger enterprise, begone over with F. Emerson Andrews, Director of the Foundation Library Center, 588 Fifth Avenue, New York 36, NY, who is the best informed person on the subject. Also it would be a good idea to keep close to John May, The Director of the San Francisco Foundation, who has already been so helpful to us.

The Monterey Foundation, Jim is a very proper memorial to you, Miss Jacks, Helen Russell, and the others who envisioned it, supported it, and made it effective. You are a very useful citizen, Jim, as well as an exceedingly kind one.

Dear Charles:-

Concerning "Prophets and Pundits; Modern Style" this letter from Ed Murrow certainly gives us — you — the "Prologue".

> "It occurs to me that something in the nature of an examination of the credentials of those of us who regurgitate our prejudices under the title of news analysis might be useful.
> In short, I am for full disclosure not only so far as the news is concerned, but so far as those who manipulate it"

Well there it is!

Now you know personally many of these news commentators. I know very few. But they come into my home, most of them daily, or weekly or in other spaces of time. They come over the radio, the TV screen, the daily newwpapers, the slick magazines, the learned quarterlies, (Foreign Affairs, for example), and sometimes in the opinions, fashioned by them expressed with authority by those with whom I may converse.

Now who are these people and what may be their competence? What makes them tick?

I might mention some whose lives and labhrs we might explore with the possibility of this book, which we might name, in honor of Ed; "The Regurgitators!".

Ed Murrow, himself, Walter Lippmann, Chet Huntley and David Brinkley, Joseph Harsch, Roscoe Drummond, The Alsop Brothers, Elmo Roper, Norman Cousins, Edgar Mowrer, David Schonbrun, Howard K. Smith, — to name a few.

Now I will set for myself the task of digging up their biographies starting with what they have themselves put down in "Whp's Who?" You will gather your anecdotes, clothe the bare bones of these biographies with the lustre of their beings and behavior, and we will together estimate how it is with them, and how much dependence we may place in their comments and prognostications!

We might begin to tie in such noble publisher, Mas Schuster, Ordway Tead, Ben Hibbs, Bennet Cerf, or some other planter of books, which also should be included in the list of subtle opinion-formers that creep into my home, and yours. How about it? Shall we get going?

Dear Ed:-

Thank you for your letter. I wish — how I wish! — that you could come here and live for a while in this very stimulating and alive community, and really observe what is going on here — and might.

Since my so-called retirement it is known in this community that I have had experience in college affairs and I am cinstantly — and to my great satisfaction — visited by young people who are concerned with their education and how to go about getting on!

For a while I went out to Fort Ord and had the inspiration of personal conversations with soldiers who were in uniform and who presently would be out of it and who were interested in taking up their studies again in school.

Just now I am reading this pamphlet gotten out by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, which Governor Rockefeller sent me, on "The Pursuit of Excellence" which certainly ought to be read by all school board members and all the literate in this country for that matter.

Out of this, such an idea as this rushes up to my mind and I wish you would toss it around.

Why not have a program over TV in which some fine personable experienced teacher, — one of the Society of the Emeriti for example, — known as STUDENT COUNSELLOR — talks to students one at a time, — perhaps one on a program, who seeks to advance himself, pursuing excellence!

We have Dear Abby telling those what to do who get in some kind of a sex or social problem, — and that is very good, but I wonder what would be the response if some warm hearted, wise, and non-pompous teacher were to discuss college education, scholarships, foreign exchange, careers, etc. etc.

Thanks to you conversations are rating high and higher on the TV.

It is quite a problem to make virtue as interesting as vice, and to hold in proper relationship excellence and equality. But there are many young people who have talent, character, and ambition and their problems are the problems widely shared, and some wise teacher, mellowed in the wood, could help, — and thereby help this tossing tohubohu!!

How about it, Dear Ed????

Affectionately

My dear Paul:-

Your letter of the 22nd moves me way way down inside!! and up too!

You, Ernest and I know something, and lots of others do too. Its no secret but it is basic, I think, to real accomplishment; it is this.

Power available is not of us, but we can be its instruments! We know this, not clearly, but sufficiently well to be sure of certain impedimenta to its efficiency through the thought and activity of ~~individuals~~.individuals.

Self centeredness is an impedimenta.
Closed mindedness is another.
Absence of "concern" for persons, singly and as humanity is another.

There are others...

Now this I know; you, Ernest and I are given in this time so fraught with peril and tremendous opportunity a situation, experience, awareness and much else — in this time of our so called retirement — to assist definitely in the direction of the trend.

The Monterey Institute, which owes its existence primarily to the vision, devotion and competence of one man, — Gaspard Weiss — who also shares our conviction as to this "mystic" power that flows through life, — is an instrument in itself with great possibilities for proving and for expanding, here and in other places.

This is a time when the Ford Foundation, for example, of which you have been a wise counsellor, through the Fund for the Advancement of Education, could well send emissaries here, — and without our appeal! and them, fully informed, say to us; "What can we do to help?!"

You are very kind in what you have written to me, and I am most grateful, and may God give you the satisfaction we enjoy in our days of retirement to be used, and in such a very timely Cause.

I shall always send you copies, and like the Juggler of Notre Dame, I can offer, as he offered "his act", my typewriter!!!

My dear Mr. Mark Goldes:-

Your ~~quick~~ quiet assured comment; you wanted to build a college remains, rushing around inside me! I talked the other day with our mutual friend, Will Shaw A.I.A., and he spoke of you with high regard.

Just now I am reading "The Pursuit of Excellence; Education and the Future of America" done by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund and sent to me by Governor Nelson Rockefeller. I will presently pass it on to you! This paragraphshould pursue us!

"The pattern of future population will present two vital problems. The first concerns the flood of young people who will place an immense pressure on educational institutions in the next twenty years, and on the labor market shortly after. The second problem involves the social and individual problem posed by the rapidly expanding older group. Both of these problems will occupy our attention in later chapters!"

Also this line:

"Twenty years hence, California will in all probability be the most populous state!"

Now this "idea" of a college ties both of these "problems" together.

There is this increasing pool of able, distinguished, and retired scholars, of the Emeriti Census, "right across the Board". There is the pressing necessity of the expansion of the University of California. There is the endowment of this Peninsula for educational advantages. There are the existing institutions of "higher learning" already here waiting to be gathered together by the University. There is the proved example of Oxford University. There is the cooperation of government, corporations, benevolent persons and boards.

I played with the idea the other day with some friends; how could you go about building a college for 350 students without any immediate money? We came up with some very interesting ideas!!

My dear Mr. Shephard:-

Thank you very much for your welcome note concerning the "Dentist cloth".

I am obviously in this matter over my depth! but I have a very warm feeling for the Crown Zellerbach Corporation, as well you know, and for many reasons. Even own a bit of its stock!!

But I was no end impressed with the efficiency and cheapness of the plastic-tissue cloth, and I wondered if it could not have many other proper uses.

For example many a baby I have seen in my life, spilling its food into its bib, and the bib changed and changed. How simple to have one of these devices, and done in various sizes for various uses.

Scottkins? No. NO! ZZZZZZZZZZZZZZZZZ!

The attached letter to Dr. Paul Rehmus, representative of the Ford Foundation (Fund for the Advancement of Education) will interest you and add to your approval of what you have given the spur!

The coming of President Ernest Jaqua to our vice chairmanship has helped enormously.

Now the job is to get endowment which will enable us to have our own charter and thereby build permanence.

I often wonder when the day comes — please may it come — when the swords are ploughshares, what will happen to the richly supplied US Navy Post graduate school and the Army Language School. Both places would be ideal for the expansion of the University.

Helen and I want very much if we can work it out to go to Oxford and find out all we can about its organization, administration, and bugs, and also and especially how the Taylor Institution of Modern Languages fits into the whole. ,

I wish you would come down sometime and lunch with me!

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies

REGULAR SESSION JUNE 26 TO ANGUST 14, 1959

SPECIAL SESSION JUNE 15 TO SEPTEMBER 4, 1959

(for proposed new courses in French and Russian)

PURPOSE

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies offers its students a unique opportunity, not only to study foreign languages, but also to become familiar with the civilizations these represent. Both the Language and Political Arts courses foster appreciation of significant religious, philosophical, and economic movements in history. The aim of the Institute is to avoid duplication of courses that are usually offered in colleges and universities. It endeavors, by means of small classes, expert instruction, and concentration of effort, to accomplish in its session of seven weeks results that are rarely achieved in a semester of college work.

ADMISSION

Students are selected with the utmost care, and they must satisfy the Institute authorities, in advance, as to their serious purpose and special interest in the courses for which they wish to enroll. Because of the limited number that can be accepted in each class (10 in Languages, and 15 in Political Arts) it is advisable to send with the application for admission a transcript of records in high school or college. Address: Office of Admission, The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, P. O. Box 1522, Monterey, California.

LIVING ACCOMMODATIONS

A limited number of students may be accommodated in the various language houses, which hold from three to ten students each. These houses, in which two or more students share a room, are managed on a cooperative basis, and are under the supervision of mature students or staff members. All members of each household are pledegd to speak only the language they are studying, in residence as well as on the campus. Rates for room in such houses vary from $60 to $90 for the seven weeks' session. Students may also be accommodated in private homes, where, in some cases, a foreign language is also spoken. Rates for room and board in private homes range from $140 to $300 for the session. Rooms without board average $45 and up per month. The Institute will endeavor to assist students to find living quarters. Early application for special arrangements is advisable.

FEES

The tuition fee for a full coure is $180. This includes a $15 charge for textbooks and use of library facilities. Students applying for college credit for courses taken at the Institute are charged an additional registration fee of $5.

LANGUAGES AND CIVILIZATIONS

Courses on both undergraduate and graduate levels are offered in each of the following languages: French, Spanish, German, Italian, and Russian. Credits may be earned on either the graduate or undergraduate level, according to the academic status of the individual student. See the official program of the 1959 Summer Session for general information and detailed description of all courses.

Dear Ed:-

Good news!! Let us know ahead of time if you can when you will be coming out to see your mother and how some days down here will fit in. Helen and I had planned to go to Europe in late April but have changed our plans and probably will not go at all, this year. More of that when I see you.

As to this civilization of which you speak, perhaps the gentleman with the beard, who it is alleged is responsible for the same is in much the same mood he was in when he stopped by to discuss Sodom and Gammorah with one of the better type, or even when he was thoroughly displeased and decided to flood the whole business.

Remember Clare Kummer's poem,

"Creation was a great mistake.
The kind beginners often make!"

But the other day, someone said to me, referring to the great hero, whom I may claim as a friend, — and whom you will meet when you come down, "Raymond Spruance justifies creation!" If it doesn't embarrass you, I would like to suggest that you also come into that category!

There are five golf courses here if that concerns you, and if you want to sit and stare, there is the lovely sea, but if it is some open minds on this open road, we have lots of them here, from every race and nation, and from every so-called walk of life!

Ask Eric Severeid, he knows the beauty of the place, but the exciting ideas that float about and occasionally become incarnate, are something new!!

Our love for you and Janet and the best of good wishes to the son, who would enjoy one of our schools, — or is he now ready for college?

My dear Dr. Malik:-

The attached announcement of the lectures of Dr. Dexter Perkins, under the Remsen Bird Lectureship, I feel sure will interest you. I hope very much that you had the opportunity of meeting him at Berkeley yesterday and I am sure that you would immediately become fast friends.

He is Professor of Diplomatic History at Cornell, and President of the Salzburg Seminars and Advisor to the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, and is one of the most effective persons I know in serving the Cause of World amity through "People with People" able to communicate and understand how it is with other civilizations, and to create the atmosphere of mutuality, in which professionals like you can do what is your responsibility!

I recall the occasion of your presence at Occidental with great appreciation and the correspondence I have enjoyed with you some time ago.

Also as an alumnus of the American University of Beirut, I feel especially close to you, for Bayard Dodge, Stephen Penrose and Paul Leonard, I count as friends! Bayard and Mary were guests at the same time we were in London of Mary Borden Spears whom you doubtless also know.

I want to keep you informed of the work of this Institute which has also received the fostering of Kamil Said, of the Lebanon, a graduate of the American University and the head of the Arabic Department of the Army Language School.

God bless you and your kind!

Dear Maggie:-

The best to you and Merritt.

I am very sorry that I did not tell Merritt that Dr. Dexter Perkins was at the Claremont. I wanted very much to have you two meet him and his charming wife. Well it will happen. He has caught the ball immediately on the importance of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies as a demonstration and a proving, and has immediately accepted Gaspard's invitation to be one of our advisers.

I will follow up at once on the possibility of your going to Salzburg for the Summer Seminars perhaps in 1960. It would help in the tying together if the Ruddocks and the Jaquas could both go. Ernest Jaqua will succeed me as Chairman next year and he has much to give to the Institute in academic counselling etc.

As to the Overstreet book, — wasn't that somethin , that I should so strongly recommend it to you, and you had given it to me. (Senility??)

I am attaching another pile of copies of letters. I have found that ideas can be gotten over quite well in this "looking over the shoulder at someone reading his mail!!)

Ted and Peggy Ogden from Mountainville, New York have been with us and he is as keen about the value of the Overstreet analysis as you and I think is in a mood to buy out the next edition. He has just bought a home in Palm Springs and will be out here more frequently. He has a Foundation from which he gives liberally to good causes in his County and especially in Cornwall to the Storm King School of which he is a Board member.

I hope the Overstreets can come out soon and give the Remsen Bird lectures at Occidental College. We are hoping that the Ed Murrows will be out t is summer. Note letter.

Have a good week-end. Love to all.

My dear Adriano:-

Thank you very much indeed, for your warm and welcoming letter of the 14th, and your gracious comments on the 45th Anniversary which we are about to celebrate and which we had hoped to celebrate in your presence!

But circumstances, beyond our control, have made it necessary for us to delay our trip to Rome, and we are not sure just when we can get away, but one of the main lures is you!

The lectureship at Occidental College, was established by Euclid and Elizabeth McBride, and it is a source of great inspiration to me, and a very high honor, that it bears my name.

The lecturer this year was Dr. Dexter Perkins, Professor of Diplomatic History at Cornell and the President of the Salzburg Seminars. He will leave for Europe shortly, and will appear in Rome with his very charming wife after they have been in Greece. I have asked William Gahagan to be on the outlook for them and I want to be sure that they meet you. The Olivetti Corporation has been, I note, represented at the Salzburg Seminars.

The beautiful book of the 50 years of the Olivetti Cirporation I showed to Dr. and Mrs. Perkins, and they were also very much inspired by it. I am thinking that I will give it to the Library Of Occidental College, that many more may enjoy it. The College has a special room of beautiful books. It will take some time for us to part with it, especially the pictures of the babies in the Nursery!

We will keep you informed of how it is with us.

Dear Sir:-

The following letter has been received by the administration of the Army Language School. With the approval of the Commandant, Col. Walter Kraus, I am forwarding it to you. Such commendation should be widely known and appreciated.

My dear Major Murphy:-

May we acknowledge at this time your letter regarding the visit to the Army Language School of this year's members of the American civilization project of the International Teacher Development Program. The materials you sent were distributed to the grantees upon their return to Washington. As in past years, these educators expressed their appreciation for the many considerations and courtesies paid them during their visit and their admiration for your fine language teaching program. From a professional standpoint, this experience continues to be reported by the grantees as the most significant of their visit in the United States.

Thank you for your continued cooperation with us in this Program of International education.

I say you my thanks for your gracious and generous letter. I still have no idea what I am going to do or where we are going to go. Of one thing I am sure, and that is that I am in need of mature counsel from men who are wise and who care about this curious thing that we call civilization.

We are making no plans until I get off the treadmill on July 1. Some time during the summer we must go to the West Coast - State of Washington, to see my mother, and maybe we can stop by and talk about what should be done with the remnants of this mis-spent life.

Dear Ed:-

This morning's Chronicle carries an article in which it is written, that you are about to take off a year and have not yet determined how and where! You happen to be one of our heroes and are worthy of citation for many services to the changing and meshing world, and I think, perhaps alongside Eric Severeid, Howard K. Smith, some of our mutual friends in Europe, and many spread over the worldl we both count as friends! - I could well document the above statement!

Of course I have no idea what may be back of this, or what you plan, but there are a lot of ideas which immediately run through my mind as to what you might want to do.

One is come on out here where the fresh water runs and where you can, for a time stare at the stars and watch the sea foam, play some golf, and see the tossing tohubohu from an upper seat!

You could rent a house by a stream, or a golf course, or along the shore, and you could assemble the various parts of yourself and the world and decide what is the next thing to do.

Also Helen could provide amusement and deeper interests for Janet, and if you wanted to do it, we could get Casey in Thatcher, Midland, Webb, Santa Barbara, RLS School, — all of which are place of the open mind on the open road.

Chuck Teague sent me a copy of his fulsomey letter about the Person to Person Program. (Hope it continues!) But there are a hundred I could name right off, who are much more suited than I am for such! Nothing dramatic about us!!

God bless you all, and when you get time give us your plans.

Dear Ed:-

This will amuse you!!!

We have a young and very able emerging artist here named Ataide! He has never been anywhere and last month, Herman Westinghouse Fletcher, grand nephew of George Westinghouse and a patron of the arts arranged to send him to New York to visit the galleries, museums, etc. and for Larry Barretto, who was in New York, to meet him.

It was arranged also that they were to meet at the Information Desk of the Grand Central Station, for he knew nothing of the big cities!!

Larry met him and took him to his New York club, The Century!

Larry told him of the history of the Club, the story of how all the Presidents of the USA since Lincoln, (with the exception of Mr. Truman) had been members, and he seemed unmoved and wholy inarticulate!

When they got to the Club they went up stairs and as they sat in the corner of the room, Larry pointed out the various celebrities, — authors, judges, board secertaries, scholars etc. He made no comment, and seemed wholly unmoved.

Then suddenly he spied a member some distance away, and he said to Larry: "IS THAT ED MURROW?"

"Why yes," answered Larry.

"JESUS CHRIST" he exclaimed "WELL THEN THIS CLUB CERTAINLY HAS CLASS!!"

We listen to Person to Person regularly and are pleased to see you looking so well!

We have some pretty fine young men moving into political leadership and responsibility, and on both sides of the aisle — except one young man from South of here, we do not trust at all!!

Dear Ed:-

Here is a self explanatory letter from Bob Champion, the Director of the International Science Foundation. The ISF had planned its second conference on Man Power, to be concerned with "Senior Man Power" this Spring, but for several reasons as you will note it is now possibly set for the Summer.

If you and family can come out here for a bit of relaxation, Bob would like it to be when you are here. Dr. Van Braun is apparently tied up for 90 days with other matters.

This is an ideal place for such a conferring as was revealed in the first one held last year at the US NavyPG School.

We have recently had a visit from Kimmis Hendrick, Western Representative of the Christian Science Monitor who left here with clear stars in his eyes. The great ideas may germinate anywhere. They may be fashioned into laws and otherwise at the top. But to be tried and proved generally they must be incarnate in persons and develop in the proving in community. The great sprawling, impersonal megalopolis certainly has brought forth such ideas but by and large it is in the intimate community such as this one that the demonstration takes place. Such is certainly going on here and you better come and take a look. THIS I BELIEVE

One thing that concerns me as I sit up here on the upper seats and watch the play is that we have in this country a wonderful resource of senior man power which is greatly needed but the use of it limited -- for teaching and that is the Senior Man Power of the Army and Navy. Have you looked into this?

We are having quite a downpouring of refreshing showers. The country will be right pretty when you arrive.

Best to you and Janet from Helen and your ever

Dear Tony:-

Thank you for your very welcome letter written as you were on your tour of the world for the State Department. The letter is very exciting and I wish very much that we could have a talk with you as to its contents.

As you know by inspection, much is going on in this community of imagination faith knowledge and demonstration, which fits precisely into the work which you are doing. So be sure to route yourself through here on your way back from many places.

Note attached which relate thereto.

Paul Webb and I have had some correspondence on the organization of a kind of association of friends of the Overseas School. I want to talk to you about that.

Also as you travel keep your eye out for graduates of the Army Language School who will be discovered in many areas of serving all over the planet.

When you get back I want to go into the plans of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies with you for it is working in the same field. We got under way especially well the third year, thanks to the Crown Zellerbach Foundation and an increasing group of friends. This Fourth Seminar ought to be twice as good. More of that when I see you.

Helen has been having a nasty time wit a kind of virus in the head but is much better and should be up and around to-day.

The idea that pounds away in me is that "People to People" held together in friendliness, mutual understanding and cooperation, can help create the atmosphere in which the professionals like yourself can do their job effectively and well. I have in my own limited experience many proofs that it is so, and one of the best came from the occasions which you arranged in Rome.

I am sure that you miss the family and that is the supreme limitation of your present assignment. But you are on your way to the stars, and I wish I had a pack of gold to add to the sparse amount the Government appropriates for such doing.

Helen joins in affectionate regards, and God guard you on your way, and take care of Phylis and the children.

PRESS RELEASE

Excerpt from NEW ZEALAND SCIENCE REVIEW, Vol. 15, July-August, 1957

"The International Science Foundation"

Here is a valuable new idea filling a major gap in the large-scale co-ordination of science and scientists. Initiated in San Francisco in early 1954, the Foundation aimed at combining engineering and scientific societies, educational institutions, research foundations and corporations in the San Francisco Bay area into a single body. This would assemble a complete information of the activities of these organizations and provide also a service which would enable scientists and engineers visiting the area to contact all organizations in the area with which they had a common interest.

This objective was achieved in the publication in 1956 of Scientific Resources of the San Francisco Bay Area, a comprehensive directory of a total of 618 societies and associations, universities and colleges, scientific institutions and foundations, industrial laboratories and applied research facilities, and Federal, State, county, and municipal agencies.

Each entry gives the address, the senior administrative personnel, objectives or field of activity, special facilities, number of members or employees, etc. There is a separate cataloguing in terms of special interests--e.g., astrophysics, electronics, food technology, and so on, each division giving a complete directory to the organizations and institutions concerned in any particular field. Anyone visiting San Francisco need not miss a single contact.

This one aspect of survey provides the background to the second main function of the International Science Foundation. This is the service to visiting scientists and engineers enabling them to contact scientists and engineers in their special field of interest, to visit institutions where there is scientific activity in the special field of interest to undertake higher study in centres advanced in a special field, and even to spend a period of research in a centre offering special research facilities.

Here is the break-through in the bewildering complexity of organizations which has confounded scientists and engineers from overseas when visiting the United States. As a further part of the service offering for the visiting scientist, the Foundation is prepared to assist scientists and engineers to seek finance by grants or fellowships for any of the above purposes.

The completeness of the function of the International Science Foundation as shown in the Bay Area has been increased by the extension of the Foundation to other metropolitan areas in the United States. To bring about contact farther afield, the Foundation has invited many organizations to join with it as participating bodies. The Royal Society of New Zealand has this status in this country and receives the publications and other information from the Foundation. This may be consulted by any scientist or engineer here who seeks to plan an effective programme in the United States. The Royal Society will help to establish contact with the Foundation.

It can only be hoped that, in time, we shall develop to the full the equivalent of the Foundation in this country. We are part way to the objective, for the Directory of New Zealand Science in most respects provides the organized body of information needed as a first step. We are not without experience in assisting visiting scientists and engineers to occupy their time in this country to full advantage.

Dear Rem:

You mention that Ed Murrow is considering coming to Monterey in the summer. If this is probable and if it turns out that it would offer the only possibility of our getting him to participate in our meeting, wouldn't it be a good idea to postpone the meeting and hold it in July or August, or whenever he is going to be in Monterey, rather than in April as now planned?

I probably wouldn't be getting ideas like this if it weren't for the fact that yesterday I received a wire from ABMA indicating that von Braun and all his playmates would be under wraps for the next ninety days and would be unable to be with us in April.

What are the Murrow dates and what do you think our chances are of getting Murrow's cooperation in staging our meeting?

With all good wishes.

My dear Mr. Cherry:-

Thank you for your letter of the 6th. I am highly honored that Col. Richard J. Stillman has given my name for reference.

As Vice Chairman of the Citizens Advisory Committee of the 6th Army, and Chairman of the sub-committee concerned with the affairs of the Army Language School, I have had the rare good fortune for now many years to enjoy the association with the personnel of Fort Ord and the Army Language School.

In this connection I became an admirer and friend of Col. Stillman who saw the opportunity here, not only for military training but to counsel the soldiers -- also students! -- on their way.

His academic record is of course known to you. It is obviously outstanding.

I have had no experience in observing his services directly in teaching, but I would think, knowing the quality of the man, the zeal for the helpfulness he might give to young people, and his varied educational services that he would decided fill the requirements of the position for which he offers himself.

I am very glad you have written to me and am eager to endorse Col. Stillman. We can use many more of these able people who have served us in the Army and Navy!

Mr. Kimmis Hendrick,
Christian Science Monitor
650 South Grand Avenue,
Los Angeles, California

My dear Kimmis:-

With your recent, and spirit and thought provoking, epistola of the 11th before me and with the rain pouring gently above my head, and with the ideas which we have talked about pressing about in my "inner being" let me get down on paper some opinions that well up and are germane to the theme of our "concern".

These great and inspiring, and for me, demonstrable statements of Paul in the letter to the Colossians, and in the other letters attributed to him, need to be exposed to the watchfulness, and ~~xxxxx~~ critical judgment of the trained ones especially in the realm of the mind.

"I live yet not I, but the Christ liveth in me", "I fill up on my part what is lacking in the sacrifice of Christ", "Whom we proclaim, teaching every man in all wisdom ... that we may present every man mature in Him", and the other tremendous statements , "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me", and "Love never faileth", just to give a few, almost at random, — need to be very carefully estimated in their application.

The same man who wrote these uplifting and reassuring words, wrote others which are alongside which, for me, are in an entirely different "emotional state".

"If any man preach a gospel other than the one I preach, let him be damned", "It is better to marry than burn", "I wish those that unsettle you would mutilate themselves", taken from "the mind" also at random, for example.

Now Mr. Graham, holding his Bible and declaring that everything he says is merely as an instrument, and the Bible from cover to cover is held up as the very word of God, is one who seeks good and not evil, I am sure, but also puts in hazard the honest, objective evaluation of these books, from many ages, gathered together by priests, prophets, historians, redactors, and others, with some included from the sacred writings and some excluded.

In other words, deep convictions of all sorts and especially religious need to be carefully estimated, in a free world, and by trained persons, that out of the devotion to God and Man, there may not be a confusion by which What I am, may be believed to be from my "inner being" the very God Himself and what he requires.

Read, for example, the sayings of Martin Luther, or the bitter comments in the Christian Institutes of John Calvin, or the grim and rude remarks of John Knox in his conferences with Queen Mary, and you will see what I mean. (I take my references from the "protestant current" through which I myself have been indoctrinated).

"I live yet not I but the State liveth in me", which is the Hitler zeal, "Communist infiltration, etc." of Josephe McCarthy is of the same kind of self identification of the fanatic brand.

Incidentally how fortunate we are in this time when we all more or less quiver in the presence of the power in our hands which could obliterate us, — that "Billy Graham" is not a Hitler, a KKK, a Silver shirt, a fascist, a Nazi, a communist, or an exploiter of fear for gain, as some have been who are nameable!!!

It has been my good fortune to know some very wonderful people who have found the quickening of faith, the assurance that there is Mind beyond the appearances, and who would join with St. Francis in his ever inspiring prayer, which is above my typewriter, — and who have found their Way of Life, through many religions, many and varied bases of living.

You have doubtless read the opinions of the young Princeton students which appeared in this week's LIFE. Well may we ponder them!

A scientist of note said to me the other day that this year could be and probably would be the most important year in human history. That is another observation to ponder.

The strontium 90 sifts down and enters our bones.

Billions are being spent in fear of evil, in a strange race to reach the moon.

The world presses in on every side.

What a conflict must be going on in our own South, especially, where nearly everybody is a member of some Christian Church, — and what to do about the colored people, haunts, distresses, and makes bitter.

I am seventy! They who are of my age level are but nine percent of the whole! What remains of my years of wandering and wondering that I hold as for me true effective and important?

"What we need is more scientists, mathematicians, engineers?" to meet the menace. But after all to have the "know-how" of things is not the answer to the quest, of the Good life and how to walk in it, — is it?

I have read and pondered of many creeds; Apostolic, Athanasian, Nicene, Westminster, Augsburg, Tridentine, and many others. What unloving things have been done because of them.

As you know, I sense Kinship with you, and share with you the conviction that these words which were quoted as of Paul, - of themselves and apart from these others, present a way of life that we have proved!!

With deep appreciation of your friendship and greatly inspired by your recent visit and your quick understanding of the power that is in this community and in this ~~most~~ potent time,

Affectionately

University of California, Berkeley, Cal.

Dear Tod:-

Attached are some letters which relate to the many matters to which you give your spark and guiding hand.

I am delighted that you and Fletcher Dutton have joined the group to which the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies looks to for advice.

We watch with much hope the prospect of the University coming to our midst, and if it does, -- as seems most logical -- it will, I feel sure, take advantage of the special almost ~~xxxxxx~~ unique opportunities which are offered here in language training and understanding of the world civilizations.

To this end the World Affairs Council, in its area of concern, and the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, in its area of concern, and the Army Language School in its area of concern, have a common concern which needs just the sort of weaving which you can make and promote.

I told Gaspard W iss the other day, that we should right now be thinking of a possible site for a permanent home for the Institute across the street from the University -- if it decides on the general area of the Tarpei flats.

I keep in touch now with the experts in Oxford, where so many educational institutions are meshed and among them the Taylor Institute of Modern Languages.

It is very pleasant to sit up here on the top bleachers and see what is going on in the field, and to have occasions to utter a cheer to those who serve, as you.

One other matter I wan t to talk to you about is this resource of Senior Ma n Power among the retired b ass and braid, that is desperately needed in the teaching profession. ~~xxxxxxxxxx~~ Please note attached on the subject.

God bless you and all your works.

Mr. Walter Warfield,
President the Board of Education
The Monterey Public Schools,
Colton Schools, Pacific Street, Monterey, Cal

My dear Mr. Warfield:-

When the Monterey Peninsula College was in process of founding, the Board of Education invited me to be a "consultant" as indicated above!. The other day I found some of the stationery. As I have never been discharged from this happy duty, perhaps I am still in this relationship to this important institution. I am bold enough to think so.

So. I would like to make a suggestion.

This is, so I am told by a very distinguished physicist, destined to be probably the most important year in human history, and its importance centers in the education of youth!

There is a great need, almost a desperate one, of additional teachers and school rooms, and institutions of higher education and especially here in waxing California.

Right now the Peninsula College is losing its President and your Board will be seeking a successor.

There is a pool of Navy and Army trained and available persons for teaching and administration, and while most of them have not had the specific training or the required secondary credential, they have had the equivalent and much more. I realize the laws are specific. But laws which do damage to our Counrt in such a crisis can be temporarily suspended or changed.

In this pressing time, I should like to recommend to your honorable Board for the vacancy in the Presidency of the Monterey Peninsula College, a man who seems in every possible way prepared for just such an assignment, namely Admiral Earl Stone, recently retired as Commandant of the US Navy Postgraduate Schools.

His outstanding record in the service of his Country I feel sure is known to you. Also you know, I feel sure, also the manner in which he had endeared himself to this Community, and that his experience as an administrator, naval officer, in National Security, and admirably, furnishes him for this office.

May I, therefore, commend him to you and express the opinion, if there are laws that interfere, it should be possible, for the good of our Country to have them in some manner suspended, that he may serve us in this critical and highly potent time.

My dear Bertha Tuma:-

Very cordial greetings and good wishes!

You are exceedingly kind to me through the years in keeping me on the list for the Bulletin! I am most grateful. When I realize how many retired Presidents of colleges there are, I am more than casually aware that it is so!!

Let me return, at least symbolically, the compliment.

Attached to this letter is the report of the Third Summer Seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, a very important enterprise with which in these days of "bleacher sitting" I have a part.

Monterey Peninsula has become a most important center of various kinds of educational institutions, which may presently be woven together if the University of California chooses this area for one of the much needed additional campuses.

There is now (1) The Army Languagr School, (500) teachers teaching an annual in-put of 2,000 soldiers, from which 25,000 taught in 30 languages have graduated, (2) The US Navy Postgraduate Schools, — three of them, (3) This fine emerging Institute of languages described in the attached, (4) The Fort Ord Training Center, where there are now 20,000 soldiers, (5) Two very fine Junior Colleges, (6) The Firestone Research Laboratories,(7) The Santa Catalina School for Girls and the Robert Louis Stevenson School for Boys, (8) The Carmel Art Institute, and the H opkins Institute of Marine Biology. Quite a place.

I wish that Dr. Distler could come out sometime and see how this beautiful and highly endowed Peninsula is blossoming.

Anyway... You remain in my mind and heart for your many courtesies.

Mr. Kimmis Hendrick,
The Christian Science Monitor

My dear Kimmis:-

Thank you for your very welcome letter concerning your visit to the Peninsula. I am sending it over at once to Paul Winslow to read — and return — knowing that he and Ruth would feel the full pleasant impact of what you have said of that visit and other matters!

The Epistle of Colossians, has for many years, even since my student days had a special lure for me. It does not seem to be like any other of the Pauline epistles. He was onviously aware of the various Gnostic sects and related Greek philosophies. So many of the words are words of the Gnostics.

But the sentence that digs in especially is "I live yet not I, but the Christ liveth in me." Paul never knew of course the historic pers on and what "The Christ" meant to him is certainly a matter to consider.

But this I know, and that is there is a power beyond the appearances, beyond and in matter and motion and energy, which is manifested in our own beings, which seems to interpenetrate with all of us, and with which we can be identified and which can function through us!

"I fill up in my flesh what is lacking in the sacrifice of Christ"

But you can pick out almost any sentence and find it exciting.

"Filled with the knowledge of his will in all spiritual wisdom and understanding"

"In him all things were created, in heaven and on earth." "He is before all things and all things were created through him and for him".

"Him we proclaim, admonishing every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man mature in him."

"Put on love which binds everything together in perfect harmony".

The personal greetings at the end read so authentic.

"Tychicus will tell you all a out my affairs".... And with him Onesimus, the faithful and beloved brother, who is one of yourselves. They will tell you everything that has taken place here". (Look up Onesimus in Philemon!!)

Let us keep the mail nice and warm. An opportunity of wide dimensions is ours!!!

Dear Ed:=

Your letter just received is very exciting! It is a grand idea for you to plan to bring Janet and Casey out here this summer, and we will be delighted to prepare the way.

There is so much going on here that I am sure would interest you and your friend, Friendly, for a "See It Now", or some such program.

The attached letters and the report of the Third Summer Seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies will reveal the fact.

You know the region very well and how beautifully suited it is for a campus of the University, and if the University comes then all sort of related educational forces and persons can be meshed for the Cause Celebre.

As you know also, our mutual friends the Albert Ruddocks have poured their gold over Cal-Tek. Albert is now President of the Board.

What could well be explored by you is the way in which a community has become alert to what a community could do to apply its resources to the philosophy and laws of the land.

Last week Kimmis Hendrick of the Christian Science Monitor came up and spent several days with us, and as indicated in his attached letter has returned "amazed" and is preparing an article on this Movimento Communita!

The Truman TV was simply magnificent. I hope you will do one with Mr. Hoover. and I wish you could bring into incarnation the spirits of Washington, Jackson, Lincoln, Wilson and Roosevelt for the same sort of historic recording.

We plan to be here all summer and can serve you and Janet in any way. Lots of nice places to stay, looking over the sea and smiling.

Affectionate regards from us both.

Dear Albert and Margaret:=

Your nice warm letter has just arrived.

We will call you presently and find the time that suits you for our coming to Montecito, which we very much want to do.

The suggestion was made that we bring Raymond and Margaret Spruance, some time, and that we would be delighted to so when it fits into the various schedules. But Helen and I could pop down some week-end certainly in March. We'll give you a call.

Right now the Monterey Peninsula is buzzing, as indicated in the attached, with the investigation going on as to the location here of a campus of the University of California.

For many reasons it seems ideal to us. Monterey has everything!!!

Raymond has taken the Chairmanship of a community committee serving the University and he told me the other day that nothing has interested him more since retirement from the Navy than trying to bring the University here. You will hear more about this.

We had a letter from Ed Murrow yesterday with the word that we might see him here this summer. That is very exciting and we hope that it works out. If it does we can drive Janet and Ed, and Casey too if he comes, over this blessed State and bring them to see you, which I am sure they would greatly enjoy.

You doubtless saw the Truman interview. What an historic document that will be!

I have added up 70 years and on the whole feel pretty good, but wish I had a later model for these highly potent times.

We send you both our most affectionate regards, Valentine greetings, (What a Valentine Helen got from SB!!!!)

Superintendent Roy E. Simpson,
The Board of Education of the State of California
Capital Avenue, Sacramento, Cal.

My dear Roy:-

Your visit to Monterey, inspection of a possible campus of the University, the luncheon at the Old Capital Club, the good talk, and all that happened on the occasion of your coming remain an inspiration and a creative source!

This year seems so poten t to all of us who see, — though "through a glass darkly" — that it is evident that no time should be lost in making ourselves competent to meet the pressing situation.

A friend of mine, a distinguished scientist, said the other day, that this year could be, probably would be, the most important year in human history!! I might be given to superlatives of that sort, but not he!!

It is very evident also that a special opportunity in view of the many factors of education in this area that the new President of the Monterey Peninsula College could be a leading person in guiding, counselling, and properly meshing the various educational forces here.

I realize that the man commended, Admiral Earl Stone, does not have a Secondary Credential, or an Administration Credential, which can only be gotten if he has the Secondary Credential, — but what he has and is for this critical time are of such a nature that it would seem that somehow he could be granted special privilege for this post.

Admiral Spruance and I would be more than ready to come to Sacramento to confer with you and others who determine and to emphasize what we very well know, that in this day of desperate need of first class teachers and especially in the sciences and mathematics, there are hundreds of military men, army and navy, who could, in t is extremity, serve our Country and would be willing to do so, in the work of teaching and administration.

Having had a lifetime of administration — and no secondary credential or administrative credential — I feel quite sure that the job can be done by the possession of other types of training an d experience!! The job of an administrator, it seems to me, is the one of enabling a teacher and a student to be together in the art of imparting knowledge and of learning, and to choose wisely those who can teach and learn! Earl Stone has what it takes!!!

What can we do to help.

I was appointed when the Monterey Peninsula College was founded an educational consultant, and that was many y ars ago. I have, therefore, a very special interest and having never been formally "discharged" I feel a very special responsibility.

Thank you for coming. If we can be of any service to you in any way, pray command!

President Henry T. Heald,

477 Madison Avenue, New York, NY

My dear President Heald:-

This morning I received a copy of the report of the Ford Foundation listing the gifts which have been made to various persons and agencies serving the cause of learning and the good life in California. It is a most impressive and inspiring document. I am probably indebted to my friend, Mr. Dyke Brown, Vice President of the Foundation, for it. I am very grateful.

Attached is a copy of an editorial on the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies on the study of languages and civilizations, which appeared in a recent number of the Monterey Peninsula Herald. Also I am sending you a copy of the report of the Third Summer Seminar.

Frankly, it is our hope that this Institute, so strategically located and demonstrating the value of such training, may appeal to your honorable Board for benevolent subvention.

The budget is extremely small in view of the services rendered without compensation. The total amount needed for this year is $25,000.00. The Institute has the use without cost of the beautiful parochial school and other buildings of the Mission of San Carlos Borromeo, and has received generous support from many persons and also fundamental help by the recognition and subvention last year of the Crown Zellerbach Foundation.

Right now the University of California is considering the establishment of three additional campuses in the State, and one of them we hope will be located between Monterey and Salinas.

If it is so located we hope that the Institute may be able to secure land adjoining for the permanent housing.

Mr. Brown will have in his file many letters and documents on the subject for we have had much satisfaction in keeping him informed.

Last week Mr. Kimmis Hendrick, Western representative of the Christian Science Monitor spent several days with us . He is preparing articles on the Community of Monterey which are the result of his observations.

We hope very much that one of these days a representative of the Ford Foundation will come, look and see!!

Thank you very much for your letter just received and the copy of the letter from the Csonka brothers. God bless you both for what you have done to reunite this Hungarian family. Julius is in New York having gone there from the Army Language School first to serve the Hungarian refugee students at Annandale, and is now pursuing his studies at Columbia for the Ph. D. degree.

Now as to the letter to Fletch. Fletch is President and not "x". He was reelected at the last meeting of the Club and is in town and I feel sure must before this have answered your letter, which I have not seen.

There is a very proper rule of the Board that difectors serve three years and then make room for fresh blood, so I am not on the Board.

I will try to get in touch with him to-day and see what has been planned for the reception of the head of the National Trust when he comes out here.

I will write to your father at once but must get this letter off immediately to catch you before you depart for the West on the 14th.

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies

Annual Report 1957

Project for 1958

406 Van Buren Street, Monterey, California • Telephone FRontier 2-3560

THE MONTEREY INSTITUTE OF FOREIGN STUDIES

REPORT 1957

In this third year of its existence the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies has made new and decisive progress. It has been a year of definite establishment. The following brief review of the achievements in the field of administration, promotion and instruction will show that the plans made in the fall of 1956 for 1957, as recorded in our second Report, were fully carried out and even, in some instances, exceeded.

ADMINISTRATION

A new Board of Trustees has been organized. It comprises eighteen leading personalities of proven experience in many varied walks of life, all residing on the Monterey Peninsula. They are:

Dr. Remsen du Bois Bird, Chairman

Mr. Lawrence Barretto

Dr. Morse Cartwright

Mr. Stanley Ewig Treasurer

Dean Harriet Hayes

Mrs. Elizabeth Heard

Dr. Henry S. Houghton

Mr. Gerald Keith

Mrs. Sybil Fearnley, Secretary

Countess of Kinnoull

Mr. van Loben Sels

Mrs. H. Lowenhaupt

Mr. Malcolm Millard Vice-Chairman

Mr. Francis Moulton

Adm. Raymond A. Spruance

Adm. Earl Stone

Mr. Saul Weingarten Attorney

Mr. Gaspard Etienne Weiss

The new Board had its first meeting on June 20, 1957, in the Conference Room of the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, by the courtesy of a member of the Board, Adm. Earl Stone, Superintendent of the School. Dr. Bird was elected chairman, Mr. Malcolm Millard, vice-chairman, Mrs. Sybil Fearnley, secretary, Mr. Stanley Ewig, treasurer. Mr. Saul Weingarten is the Institute's attorney-at-law. Several committees were organized to plan, foster and control the various activities of the Institute:

Executive Committee, Chairman, Dr. Bird
Plans Committee, Chairman, Mr. Keith
Committee on Academic Affairs, Chairman, Dr. Hayes
Finance Committee, Chairman, Mr. Ewig
Committee on Library and Public Relations, Chairman, Dr. Barretto

A Board of Directors was formed of eminent friends living in different parts of the country ready to support the cause of the Institute with counsel and recommendations. At present it is composed of:

Dr. Geoffroy Atkinson
Dr. John Condliffe
Col. Allen Griffin
The very Rev. Dr. James Malloch
Mrs. Euclid McBride
Dr. Dwight Whitney Morrow, Jr.
The very Rev.
Monsignor Michael O'Connell
Mrs. Ellis Roberts

Finally, the friends and sponsors of the Institute form an independent group under the chairmanship of the Countess of Kinnoull.

As shown in the detailed report of our Treasurer, Mr. Ewig, and as the Board was able to verify, the budget for 1957 amounted to $12,700; we received $13,998.31 and disbursed $11,933.07 . The accounts of the preceding year were verified by Mr. John Ruster, C.P.A. Mr. Ruster's recommendations, made after his examination of our accounts, were followed by Mr. Ewig. The Institute now has a financial organization that will satisfy the most exacting requirements.

Thanks to the untiring efforts of our attorney, Mr. Saul Weingarten, who obtained tax exemption by the State of California in 1955, the Institute was recognized as a fully tax exempt non-profit corporation by the Treasury of the United States on April 5, 1957.

It should be added here that the Institute was granted another and not less valuable token of recognition when it received its first Foundation grant from the Crown Zellerbach Foundation in July, 1957.

At its second meeting on August 19, 1957, the Board of Trustees unanimously voted a budget of $24,000 for 1958. The Board unanimously decided that Mr. Weiss should assume the direction of the Institute, with full responsibility, on a full time basis.

The difficult problem of class accomodation was definitely solved for this new period in the life of the Institute when Monsignor Michael O'Connell, curate of the Mission San Carlos Borromeo, graciously offered use of the classroom of the parochial school at the Mission. The third summer session was held there, and we have the use of these splendid premises for as long as may be necessary. The Institute is thus established on one of the oldest and most beautiful sites in California, rich alike in historical associations and spiritual values.

INSTRUCTION

A new program of instruction divided the courses into three divisions: Languages and Civilizations, Political Arts, Religion and Civilization. Each department was divided into two separate sections: graduate and undergraduate. Emphasis was laid on the comparative study of the different aspects of civilizations. The program was carried out by a faculty of eight instructors, (7 natives of foreign countries, one American-born Fulbright grantee) and supplemented by 4 lecturers, Dr. Scaglione and Dr. Seabury, both of the University of California, Berkeley, Dr. Horn of Stanford University, Mr. Visser of San Francisco State College (2 natives of foreign countries, 2 American-born). There were twenty-eight students, nine graduate and nineteen undergraduate, of whom twenty-one were full time students, as against sixteen last year. Twenty students earned credits, as against eighteen last year,

The Board will be pleased to learn that several students have already expressed their desire to enroll for next summer, and that the level of achievement this summer has been remarkably high. In accordance with our established policy of high standards, every student is carefully screened at the time of application. We accept only those who are able and willing to work; a summer school may aspire to a higher level than a year-round institution. Hence, the Board will feel particularly encouraged to know that experienced seniors or graduates of the best Universities and colleges have written to us, or have told us that the Institute offered them a new approach to foreign studies and thus answered one of their basic needs.

Since 1956, it has been the policy of the University of California to accept credits earned by undergraduate students at the Institute's summer session. Stanford University has officially accepted to recognize credits earned by undergraduate students in 1957. The University of California, Los Angeles, has agreed to accept under certain conditions, graduate credits towards an M.A. and graduate work towards a Ph. D. Both Stanford University and University of California, Berkeley, have expressed their willingness to examine favorably any application by a graduate student for recognition of credits granted by the Institute. Negotiations to the same effect have been started with some of the State colleges, at the suggestion of Dr. Roy Simpson, Superintendent of Public Instruction in the State of California.

Finally, the Western College Association demonstrated its interest in the progress of the Institute by sending its Executive Secretary-Treasurer, Dr. Mitchell P. Briggs, to investigate the Institute. Dr. Briggs wrote a most favorable report to the Commission on Membership and Standards.

Relations have been maintained with the Western College Association and with Universities regarding the subject of Junior and Graduate years abroad.

Nine scholarships were granted this year, three in undergraduate Spanish, three in undergraduate French, one in undergraduate Italian, two in Political Arts. Three of these scholarships were given in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Dwight Morrow, 3 in memory of Mr. Euclid MacBride, and 3in memory of Mr. Noel Sullivan.

The library is slowly growing, in quality more than in quantity. We have been able to buy a few books on history, comparative law, French, German and Indochinese civilizations. We have received a certain number of books in English, French and German on French and German civilizations, and in English on history and public law, for which we thank Mrs. Whittmer, Mr. Philips, Mr. Gahagan, and Mme Delacour. We also thank Mr. Gahagan for the gift of his typewriter.

The medical library in Strasbourg has gratefully acknowledged reception of books and materials donated by Mrs. Roderick O'Conner and Dr. Mast Wolfson. The Institute hopes to organize a medical committee to continue and develop this fine project of good will during the coming year.

PROMOTION

In spite of comparatively limited means, both in respect of funds and time, great efforts were made towards a twofold systematic promotion: efficient publicity and academic recognition.

To meet the first end, ten thousand brochures were printed and distributed. About eight thousand were addressed personally to all Junior College professors and high school teachers in languages and civilizations and in social studies; to all superintendents, presidents and principals in Junior Colleges and in high school districts; to a certain number of school superintendents and principals in elementary districts; to all college presidents, deans and chairmen of Departments of Modern Languages, History and Political Arts (History, Political Science, Government, etc.), and to the majority of the professors in these different departments in all the Universities and colleges of California, Oregon, Nevada and Arizona. Brochures were also sent to a few other outlying institutions, as well as to some personalities in the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy and Spain. Thirteen hundred were distributed directly to all the teachers of four local school districts. We advertised in one issue of the California Teachers' Association monthly journal, a few times in the college dailies of Stanford University and University of California, Berkeley, and once in the San Francisco State College daily.

The full fruits of such a publicity can only be reaped after several years, but already today we have evidence of its efficiency.

Mr. Weiss gave lectures to the Foreign Language Teachers' Workshop in the Acalanes high school district; the foreign language teachers at the Kern County Teachers' Institute at Bakersfield where he helped to create a Foreign Language Teachers Association; the Foreign Languages Teachers Association of the Monterey Bay area on the day of its founding, for which the Institute was largely responsible; the meeting of the Alpha Mu Gamma societies of Northern California at San Francisco State College; a meeting of a Foreign Language Teachers group at Sacramento.

Mr. Weiss was invited to the fall and spring meetings of the Western College Association and took part in the fall and spring meetings of the Foreign Languages Teachers Association of Northern California at San Francisco State College and Morgan Hill. He also attended the fall meeting of the American Association of Teachers of French at the University of California, Berkeley, and the meeting of the Philological Association of the Pacific Coast in Tucson, Arizona. On all of these occasions, he made valuable acquaintances and had the opportunity of promoting and publicizing the Institute.

Fruitful visits were made to the deans of the graduate division of University of California, Berkely and Los Angeles, and also of Stanford University. Mr. Weiss saw the Dean of Letters, Arts and Sciences at U. C. L. A., as well as many professors in all three institutions and in San Francisco State College.

Dr. Roy Simpson, Superintendent of Public Instruction in the State of California demonstrated again this year the interest he has shown since the first year of the Institute's existence. Thanks to his kind help, the Veteran's Administration gave us recognition. With a view to the valuation of graduate studies, negotiations have been started with San Jose and San Francisco State Colleges. The presidents of the two institutions visited the Institute as did other leading personalities all throughout the year. Nearly all of them were the personal guests of our Chairman, Dr. Remsen Bird, the others being guests of the Institute.

The Institute once again offers its grateful thanks to all who have contributed towards its success.

We wish to express our deep sorrow at the loss of Dr. James Hagerty, a friend from the first hour and during the ensuing years. Dr. Hagerty presented the Institute's request to St. Mary's College for sponsorship in the form of credits. His counsel was constant and invaluable, his enthusiasm infectious, his authoritative confidence inspiring.

PROJECT for 1958

It should be possible to raise sufficient funds to cover the budget within a short lapse of time. A certain part has already been pledged. The Institute hopes that several California Foundations will desire to follow the example of the Crown Zellerbach Foundation. It also hopes to be able to present its program here in Monterey to qualified representatives of the great national Foundations.

To implement the policy decided upon by the Board of Trustees, three scholarships should be given to carefully selected students in each section of each department, under the advice of their instructors, and similarly to a few high school graduates. The Committee on Academic Affairs will assist the Director in preparing and establishing the rules.

A special section for undergraduate lower division students will be created in the Political Arts division, without changing the present upper division. In Languages, a combined program will be established for lower division students who have acquired sufficient knowledge and fluency to follow upper division courses; this will be after the example of leading Universities and colleges in the United States.

The Institute will work towards more complete recognition by the Western College Association and its Commission on Membership and Standards. Negotiations will be pursued with one of the foremost California colleges, with a view to obtaining its sponsorship in the matter of graduate studies and to bringing about a broad collaboration,

The study of the organization of Junior and Graduate years abroad will be pursued in concurrence with the member institutions of the Western College Association and with French, German, Italian, Spanish and Swiss Universities. As soon as feasible, the Director will visit these foreign Universities and report on the project.

With the achievement of a wider recognition and with greater means of promotion at our disposal, we shall be alle to look for a notable increase in enrollment during 1958. Every consideration will be given to enriching and enlarging the program; experience gained over three years will prove of the utmost worth.

We plan to keep in close touch with our alumni and to bring growing numbers of them back to us for new sessions. They will assist in promoting our aims and we shall assist them at all times in the pursuit of their studies or in the progress of their careers. This has already been undertaken with great success.

The Institute is now a force. Its influence is spreading and will continue to spread in every field of foreign study that has for its purpose international understanding, together with the knowledge, maintenance and development of the basic cultural values of our civilization. We sincerely hope that the importance of pursuing such goals will meet with wide recognition; the matter is of paramount significance to this country in its leadership of the world.

Dear Ed:-

A big time scientist said to me in the PO at Carmel; "1958 is the year! We either harness this power for good or we head to perdition", -- words to that effect!

Well I will be seventy and with whatever is left I certainly intend to add by pennyworth to the upgrade!

This place, believe me, Ed is as exciting as any community I know, and it looks sometimes as if the Unseen has chosen it for a very special demonstration.

How I wish you would have Mr. AAron or some other henchman come out and take a look and set up a "Person to Person" of Admiral Raymond Spruance and what he is doing to make the world he helped to save worth the saving and protect it from those animalicules you referred to.

Take alook at the letters attached and the program of one of the 8 annual commenteements of the Army Lahggage School. When we came up here pretty bedraggled, General Swing appointed me on the Civilian Advisory Committee of the 6th Army and in that a sub-committee was appointed consisting of Morse Cartwright, Henry Houghton and myself, and out of that has come this civilian counterpart the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies.

I am attaching its Report of the Third Summer Seminar.

Its the Ember Season! God bless Janet, Casey and Ed, and if Helen were uttering this blessing she would add, "Make Ed President of the USA".

With affectionate regard and if you want to know how I think at this time listen to the record "This I Believe". What a strange and tragic and mysterious death of Ward and his party! Did any information ever come to light?

My deay Mr. Mello:-

It was very good to have you in our home yesterday and to watch the imagination at work in that important preliminary conference on the subject of "Senior Man Power" and its use.

Please note the attached letters.

I will set up the luncheon for the 14th of February, -- though from what I have just listened to coming from Paris, -- that seems a bit far off.

You will get in touch with Dr. Wernher von Braun and will let me know if he can be with us.

You will note that I have written to the several persons concerned on the subject of the conference.

I hope very much that Superintendent Simpson can be with us that day and that he will come down soon for some good talk.

What happens in Paris to-morrow and the days following may effect the situation.

As was indicated in the conversation, on the side, with you, our battle to-day is with the principalities and powers of the air, and it takes a combination of faith, facts and fire, -- spiritual fire -- in the human heart, as well as other matters, — to meet and defeat what is destructive to human values!

God help you in the work which you are doing, and life up our hearts.

Dear Alnert:-

The date for this luncheon to which you are most cordially invited, is the 14th of February. It will be at your Old Capital Club and the following present; Robert Champion, Robert Mello, Raymond Spruance, Earl Stone, Vernon Pick, Sam Morse, Gaspard Weiss, Yourself, myself, and we hope President Burns of the Western College Association. Perhaps Lee Du Bridge can come up.

The conference will take place in mid April at the US Navy Postgraduate School, and the subject will be the use of "Senior Man Power".

Attached are some letters relating to the matter.

Your friend, Vernon Pick, expressed a special desire to have you there!

There is a mighty lot of talk hereabouts on the possibility of the University establishing a campus in these parts and if it does there are a lot of contributing factors, which could give much satisfaction. I will tell you more about that presently.

O Yes, Leonard Firestone is invited to the luncheon. As you know the Firestone Corporation has its research laboratories here.

The Monterey Institute is certainly getting on its feet, thanks primarily to the generous friends, the leadership of Weiss, and the subvention ofthe Crown Zellerbach Foundation. Your help also much appreciated, -- your gift to the Library!

My dear David:-

Attached are some letters which will indicate how things are proppering here in Monterey for the Cause of Life Liberty and the Pursuit!

We had a fine high-powered conference on the subject of Senior Man Power at the Bohemian Club, arranged by Joe Thompson, and a follow-up here at my house yesterday when more precise arrangements were made for the Full Dress affair at the US Navy PG School in April.

I will keep you informed.

The Monterey Institute is getting under way for the summer seminar in 1958 and the outlook is very good indeed. Weiss had a most favorable conversation with the authorities at Berkeley, and the work done for graduate credit will be honored and that is most important.

On Friday, Bishop Block gave the Commencement address on the occasion of the graduation of some 22 Army personnel at the ALS School. Note what he said on the important of language study.

I am attaching a copy of the program.

David! One of these days when the Crown Zellerbach Foundation makes an inventory of the results of its benefaction, I prophecy that it will be apparent that more has come from the help given to the Institute in getting under way, than perhaps anything else it has sponsored!

I am afraid that some of your colleagues at the HQ may have wondered if they had not given too much! Our total budget last year was less than $14,000.00 thanks to so much free service and token payment. This year it will probably be about double.

I had a fine talk with Julian Davis of the Bank of America on the subject of the Bank's joining in the sponsoring. If they do it will be a change of policy, -- but the pressure of the world may justify such change of policy. No time should be lost.

Bill Gahagan sent me the calendar of the Overseas School. Nice to see you there in one of the pictures.

Stockton, California

My dear President Burns:-

There will be a conference, the second, of the International Science Foundation at the US Navy Postgraduate School, in April and a preliminary consideration of the same at the School on February 14th. You will receive more precise information presently from the Director, Mr. Robert Champion. The main theme will be the use of "Senior Man Power".

As indicated in the attached summary of a meeting here yesterday it is very much to be desired that you should, as President of the Western College Association, be present for this preliminary conversation, and give your counsel.

However before that, if you can arrange it, I wish you would come over and lunch with some of us, locally concerned, at the Old Capital Club. I can set up such a luncheon almost any time except a Friday or Saturday or Sunday. Could on Friday perhaps.

If you can do this will ~~yx~~ you give me a ring, telephone, Mayfair 4-4022.

Your relation, Jane Fylling, tells me that you come over quite frequently....

So much is happening here, as I am sure you are aware, that is important in itself and in demonstration for other areas, and I am sure the same would greatly benefit from your counsel.

You are recently back from Russia and your experience there will help!

Hoping to hear from you presently, I am

Sincerely

(4) Report of plans to be made to several on your list including Roy Larsen, President TIME Inc.

(5) Much talk about the need of a COrdinator here of the many sparkling matters related to the job in hand.

(6) Mr. Bello and you will make appointments to see President Dean Rusk of the Rockefeller Foundation while you are in New York for counsel and possible support, -- also other Board secretaries who could be helpful.

(7) There were present, Admiral Spruance, Admiral Stone, Mr. Robert Mello, Director of Personnel from the Army Ballistic Agency at Huntsville, Alabama, President Gaspard Weiss of the Monterey Institute, yourself and myself!

Note letters attached relating thereto....

Dear Albert:-

The date for this luncheon to which you are most cordially invited, is the 14th of February. It will be at your Old Capital Club and the following present; Robert Champion, Robert Mello, Raymond Spruance, Earl Stone, Vernon Pick, Sam Morse, Gaspard Weiss, Yourself, myself, and we hope President Burns of the Western College Association. Perhaps Lee Du Bridge can come up.

The conference will take place in mid April at the US Navy Postgraduate School, and the subject will be the use of "Senior Man Power".

Attached are some letters relating to the matter.

Your friend, Vernon Pick, expressed a special desire to have you there!

There is a mighty lot of talk hereabouts on the possibility of the University establishing a campus in these parts and if it does there are a lot of contributing factors, which could give much satisfaction. I will tell you more about that presently.

O Yes, Leonard Firestone is invited to the luncheon. As you know the Firestone Corporation has its research laboratories here.

The Monterey Institute is certainly getting on its feet, thanks primarily to the generous friends, the leadership of Weiss, and the subvention ofthe Crown Zellerbach Foundation. Your help also much appreciated, -- your gift to the Library!

Note attached program of the Army Language School.

Karl Block said; "Retirement is wonderful but you get no vacations." Helen has a story for you. Better come up and hear it.

Love for you and Margaret, from us both

Graduation

13 December 1957
Sports Arena
0915 Hours

FOR OUR GUESTS .....

It will be appreciated if our guests would rise with the Graduating class when the Adjutant calls "ATTENTION" for the Processional ....

And remain standing through the National Anthem and the Invocation.

THANK YOU

MESSAGE TO GRADUATES

On the occasion of your graduation, I extend to you the congratulations and warm wishes of the Staff and Faculty, as well as my own, on your successful accomplishment of a difficult course. Your success is a measure of the School's success, and graduations are therefore deeply gratifying to the Staff and Faculty.

We have endeavored to impart a functional knowledge of your various languages. However, considering the vastness of languages, it would be manifestly incorrect to claim that you are now linguists in the full sense of the term. Rather, it is more appropriate to say that you have acquired a sound foundation upon which you may build and expand your knowledge.

Your identity as graduates of the US Army Language School is now established, and we earnestly hope that the interest developed during your studies here will influence you to continue these pursuits. Only by such efforts can you be prepared to render substantial service in these critical times.

I have every confidence you will acquit yourselves well in whatever part of the world your orders may take you. I am sure that you are aware of the responsibilities which lie within the public trust confided in all of us who wear the uniform of the United States Armed Forces.

My heartiest congratulations again and every good wish for the holiday season ahead, and for a purposeful and Happy New Year. Good luck and Godspeed.

Dear Rem:

Thanks for your recent communication.

As you know, I have long thought that the pigs would inherit the earth, but I have since changed my mind. I now doubt there will be any pigs left.

We are making an effort on December 30 from 10-11 P.M.,E.S.T., which is a report of Marian Anderson's tour of Asia. You have my permission to tell your friends that it will be the best effort your dissolute, but not disrespectful friend ever undertook.

UC Campus 'Belongs' on Peninsula

The scheduled additional campus of the University of California should be located "where it belongs"—in the Monterey Peninsula area—despite offers of free or possibly cheaper sites in other areas.

That was the opinion of some 75 Salinas Valley and Peninsula UC alumni at a dinner meeting at the San Carlos Hotel last night. They signed a scroll, listing their arguments, to be sent to the university regents.

Monday a university committee will arrive to inspect a half dozen sites in the Peninsula area. The university has announced intentions to establish a branch campus in one of five counties between Monterey and San Francisco.

The alumni group's endorsement of the Pendisula as a campus site follows similar action by all the Peninsula cities and a number of school districts and other Peninsula organizations.

Reasons Outlined

Reasons behind the growing support of the Peninsula campus proposal were outlined last night by Dr. Remsen Bird of Carmel. Bird, a former president of Occidental College and honorary UC graduate, is a member of the Peninsula university site committee, headed by Adm. Raymond A. Spruance (USN-ret).

He said the campus location should not be based primarily on population or population trends or by an attractive offer of property for a location.

Instead, he emphasized what he and many alumni present felt was the most important reason—and the reason that made the Peninsula the most logical campus site—by reading a letter from Stanley McCaffrey.

McCaffrey is chairman of the UC committee, appointed by university president Robert Gordon Sproul, which will arrive Monday. He wrote:

"I am thoroughly and heartily in accord with the general principle that the new campus in the south coast region should be established where it can best serve higher educational needs."

This should be the "guiding factor for selection of the new campus," he said.

Elaborating on this theme, Bird stressed the argument that higher education already has a firm foothold in the Peninsula. He referred to the location of the Army Language School, the Naval Post Graduate School, Monterey Peninsula Junior College, Hopkins Marine Laboratory, the Fort Ord training school, and Hartnel College at nearby Salinas.

Besides these institutions, which help produce an attractive academic climate, Bird pointed out that the Peninsula includes a large number of persons greatly interested in higher education—"probably more per capita than any other area of this size in the world."

These reasons plus the "desirability of the Peninsula as a site for research laboratories" could make the Peninsula a "great educational center," he said.

The possibility of a Peninsula campus site is "one of the greatest opportunities ever given to any community in this state," he said. Salinas and Monterey groups are "united with the best spirit" behind the idea, he said.

Possible Sites

On the question of possible sites, Bird said three locations appeared to be the most favorable among those that would be shown the committee Monday.

The T. A. Work ranch is located one mile east of Monterey on the Salinas highway opposite the airport and a planned light industrial research area. It includes about 550 acres of gently sloping land with heights offering views of Monterey Bay and the Santa Cruz Mountains.

Three miles east of Monterey beyond the Work ranch, the Bishop ranch lies mostly on high ground with about 300 acres of rolling flats along the highway.

The Guidotti property plus additional land is located roughly half way to Salinas. With the possibility that Fort Ord might pull back its artillery range, this site would have about 400 acres of flat ground along the highway.

Other Areas

Other areas included the Old Capitol Site, owned by Del Monte Properties, and located on Carmel Hill with about 400 acres of flats or gentle slopes and the rest in hills and forest.

The top of Del Monte Forest with more than 1,000 acres of sloping, buildable table-land covered with pines and accessible from the Carmel-Pacific Grove highway, which is planned as an expressway.

The Hatton ranch property at the Carmel Valley mouth including a bowl-shaped site ideal for a community, but not as accessible as the other sites to regional population. It includes more than 1,000 acres of flat land adjacent to Highway 1.

These will be among the sites to be shown the committee Monday when it arrives at noon at the Naval Air Facility for a briefing and welcome by Navy School superintendent Rear Adm. E. E. Stone. Maj. Gen. William M. Breckinridge, Fort Ord commanding general has offered helicopters and jeeps to the committee for site inspections, he said.

Dear Ed:-

God Bless you for much! Right now for Howard K. Smith! What a broadcast this morning, and I wish that the whole nation could have heard him!

Attached is the report of the Third Summer Seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies which will I feel sure interest you.

What I wish and wish is that you would have Mr. AAron explore the possibilities and the value of doing a "Person to Person" broadcast of the great hero of these parts, Admiral Raymond A Spruance.

Please note what is said on the subject in the attached!

One never knows who may turn out to ~~the~~ be a Barnabas to a Paul, or what community may be the endemic center of a great awakening! Think about this.

Having spent much of the time of the First World War on the island of Corfou, I have always had a special concern for its importance in the world scene.

Thucydides tells, as you know, how the plight of Epidamnus and the concern of Corfou, a colony of Corinth, and the Athenian Empire and the whole of the Peloponnesian produced the involvement that ended the great moment of Greek culture!

We are faced with a similar situation, and reading the history of that tremendous time, all you need do is substitute for the names Athens and Sparta, The Soviets and the USA, and for the allies, one side and another, the contemporary associated nations. Really terrific.

Monterey is alive. The Zeitgeist hovers over this place. The man who leads is the one who led at Midway. If you want to know more, dear Ed, ask me!

Best to you and Janet, from your two constant admirers.

Affectionately

Gene

President Roy E. Larsen,
T I M E , Life, Time and Fortune Bldg.,
Rockefeller Plaza, New York, NY

My dear Mr. Larsen:-

TIME, November 18, 1957 lies open before me and the wide eyed Dr. Teller, from its cover (because the open Time is so opened!) is staring at me!

I recall with continued inspiration a conversation with you many years ago concerning general education and what might be done about it. At the time, perhaps the conversation had an "academic" flavor, but obviously what you had to say is revealed in the present situation as much more than that.

What I wish very much could happen is that you, or one of your emissaries could stop by Monterey and investigate what is going on in this "Community" that is decidedly awake to the needs of the time!

The hero of the hour is Admiral Raymond A. Spruance who as you know, outguessed the Japanese and perhaps saved our country from much evil.

Someone said the other day, Raymond Spruance saved the country and now he is constantly busy in trying to keep it worth the saving!

Attached is the report of the Third Summer Seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies which is part of what he is doing!

Adriano Olivetti, is so right in his Movimento Communita through which he teaches Italy the philosophy and laws and techniques of self government -- in the community. It is so it seems to me also, in the Community that the forces are released which prove the worth of what we profess!

But I would like very much to give you a full report of what is going on here, and if TIME were to put the couuntenance of Admiral Raymond A. Spruance on its cover and tell the story of this wise and courageous and humane retired naval officer to the world, I feel sure it would help in this pressing situation, needing trained brains and persons competent to train them!

With highest esteem and cordial regard,

Sincerely

Ernest Bee

President Samuel S. Stratton
Middlebury, Vermont

My dear President Stratton:-

Greetings!

As a retired College President, in this time of such tremendous meaning, in which it seems, (viewed from man's point of view) as a moment when we can demolish outrselves or apply knowledge, through good will and understanding, to the betterment of society --- I free myself to some degree of frustrations, and try to direct faith through works! What a sentence!!

But the occasion of writing to you is the thought that we might do some services together, through the leadership of Middlebury in Language Study and what is going on here by the leadership of these foreign scholars in a similar effort.

Therefore, I am sending you a report of the Third Summer Seminar and hope through this preliminary statement to engage you in correspondence.

The President's project "People to People" will succeed in building mutual understanding and cooperation by just such combinations, I believe.

However, read the attached and let us take off from there!

May I give this comment of sentiment.

My respected Grandfather in the fifties was in charge of the schools of Bennington and my mother grew up in North Bennington, and I was brought up in the area of Union College In Schenectady, where my grandfather, Isaac Watson Dunham was at one time Superintendent of Schools. So you see this is pretty much in my blood.

Admiral Raymond A. Spruance,
PO Box, Pebble Beach, California

Dear Raymond:-

Let me gather up the conversation and comments of the luncheon this noon concerning the coming of the Investigation Committee of the University of California.

There were present before the luncheon, Spruance, Stone, Farr, Pattee, Houghton, Van Loben Sels and Bird. Van Loben Sels did not continue with us for the luncheon.

(1) Senator Farr reported that General Breckinridge said that he would be ready to provide helicoptors for the air view of the properties, if desired

(2) The seating arrangement for the luncheon on the 18th at the US Navy PG School, was gone over and given to Admiral Stone.

(3) Admiral Stone told of a statement given by Allen Knight that the Janss people of LA, who developed the property around the University of California had gotten an option on 2,000 acres in the vicinity of Castroville. It was presumed that it was done mindful of the possibility of the University locating a campus in these parts.

(After luncheon Farr, Pattee and Bird looked into the record at the Abstract office and found that there was a piece of land 100 acres which they had bought near Castroville. That was all.)

(4) Considerable discussion on the desire to assure the Work family that whatever may be done, shall be wholly in accordance with their understanding and approval. This was emphasized in further conversation with Frank Work. It was suggested that Sam Morse, who enjoys the confidence of Mr. Work and is a member of the Committee should confer with Mr. Work. You will see Mr. Morse to-morrow morning and report to the Committee.

(5) It was the opinion of all present that the "Old Airport" was in every way magnificently suited for the location of such an institution.

(6) It was suggested that Admiral Stone should comment on the value especially in this highly poten t time, for the faculty of the Graduate School of the Navy to have the University proximus. This was also emphatically endorsed by comments referred to, made by Mr. Leonard Firestone with reference to the Firestone Research Laboratory adjoining the airport acres.

(7) There was considerable discussion concerning the possibility of organizing a non-profit company, which could properly exploit the land, possibly from The airport to the Bishop Property, mindful of the equities and interests of the owners and with whatever profit beyond that interest, going to the University. Very interesting!

Attached is the article on this pressing subject of training superior brains from this morning's Wall Street Journal!

Dr. George M. Day
422 Leland Avenue
Palo Alto, Cal.

Dear George:-

I have just checks with Leonard Fletcher and December 5th is fine for us.

As soon as you make it firm with Mr. Kerensky and the others let m e know.

The luncheon will be at the Old Capital Club, (Casa Amesti) in Monterey.

The little blue dining room seats eight people very nicely and I have invited, in addition to the four of you, Fletcher and myself, Admiral Raymond A. Spruance and Admiral Earl Stone, the latter the Commandant of the US Navy PG School.

Perhaps if you can be here by 11:30 we can have an informal reception up stairs and open the occasion to all the members.

Its a very beautiful Club in the Adobe, built in 1820 by a Spanish grandee named Jose Amesti, and it was restored by Frances Elkins, and in her will left to the National Trust.

The National Trust has turned it over to a group of men with the understanding that it would do several things, viz. (1) Preserve the building and its exhibition of the decorative art of France, (2) Give pleasure and satisfaction to the members, and (3) Entertain visitors who come in great numbers from all over the world.

So it is most appropriate that Messers Kerensky, Sworakowsky, the Russian student, George Day, and Leonard Fletcher should be of that number.

I am, of course, very eager to talk with Mr. Kerensky concerning the Remsen Bird lectures.

He spoke so well over "Meet the Press".

You and Fletcher will have much to say to one another for I know that the two of you agree most heartily on basic matters for the good of our society!

So till then. Be sure to let me know as soon as possible when you will come. It takes 2 hours and then a bit from Palo Alto to Monterey. Polk Street is the first street to the left as you come in, from Alvarado.

Vice President Stanley E. McCaffrey,
University of California
Berkeley, California

My dear Mr. McCaffrey:-

Last evening Admiral Raymond Spruance held the first "full dress" meeting of his Committee to confer with you and your colleagues when you come down on Monday!

There were present representatives of the several communities, of the educational institutions, the press, the graduates of the University, interested citizens, and the US Navy Postgraduate School.

The meeting was held at the US Navy Postgraduate school.

The general conversation was with reference to the best way to serve your committee when they arrive.

As you have been informed, the procedure will be pretty much as follows:

On arrival at the PG School, there will be a brief presentation of what may be planned and how it is here. Following luncheon those who find it possible to go along will gather with your committee and show the several possible sites.

On return from such investigation the group will stop by the Casa Ascoti (Old Capital Club) for some refreshing and then drive through the Army Language School and on to the Del Monte Lodge where your Committee will spend the night. Dinner will be served to the group either at the Lodge or the Rusket Club, and following that opportunity for conference.

A brochure has been prepared by Messrs Bennett, Cutter, and Shaw which will by map, and facts give you a general picture.

Admiral Spruance made the comment at the close of the meeting that nothing has interested him more since retirement than the possibility of the University becoming the leading factor in this highly endowed area. (words mine! sentiment his!)

Its a great opportunity for all of us, and as Carrie Jacobs Bond remarked OPPORTUNITY MAY KNOCK OFTEN BUT ITS BETTER TO ANSWER THE FIRST KNOCK!

Dear Earl:-

There certainly is a stirring of the spirit in these parts! It is very evident.

The luncheon yesterday was most inspiring and the fact that Raymond Spruance has caught the ball and carries it with such efficiency and zeal is for all of us invigorating, to say the least!

Now as to the possibility of a grand full dress conference concerning with "Man Power" for the present tremendous need and opportunity and under the auspices of the Navy School, -- let us dig into that one!

(1) You have written to Dr. James Killian Jr. now the President's advisor of such matters.

(2) Perhaps you will write also to your classmate, Dr. Arthur S. Adams who is President of the American Council of Education. (I will get from him presently multigraph copies of the address but if you have it run off then we could get it into circulation immediately.

(3) I will write at once also to President Henry Wriston of the America Assembly and get his cooperation. He has been invited by Occidental College to give the Remsen Bird lectures and has agreed to come. Rochard Millar his cousin is President of Occidental's Board of Trustees.

(4) I am sure that Christian de Guigne, Joseph Thompson and Bob Champion of the International Science Foundation will be ready to lead out.

(5) Last week Winch Jones, director of admissions for Cal-Tek was here and he was very enthusiastic for the idea of Cal-Tek, UC, Stanford, industry, International Science Foundation, etc. joining -- and here -- in such an endeavor.

(6) I feel sure we could get Dr. Killian, Adlai Stevenson, and other top liners who properly view this matter beyond all partisan political consideration to come.

(7) The local organizations such as the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, the Army Language School, the World Affairs Council, etc. would I feel sure be ready to assist as may be acceptable.

It is most inspiring to have you lead out in this.

The great need now is trained brains and persons competent to train brains!

Dear Ed:-

Helen and I were charmed and inspired by the broadcast last evening, "Person to Person" with your visit to the home of the Arthur Larsons. What a very wonderful family!

His comments concerning the "people with people" program certainly put stars into my eyes!

Attached is the brochure of the third summer seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, which is making marks! I wish that you could come out here sometime and see for yourself how this "Movimento Communita" is proving the thesis that people with people can create an atmosphere in which the professional diplomats can do their necessary work wisely and well.

There is a steady flow of travelers going to and returning from and arriving from, all parts of the available world.

Last week Selden Chapin, Ambassador to Iran was with us, a few months ago the head of the Christian Democrat Party Dr. Heinrich Krone of Germany visited us, in a few hours I go to Salinas to oick up Filmer S. C. Northrop of Yale, author of "European Union and US Foreign Policy".

Last year the Old Capital Club, of the Casa Amesti, (David Finley can tell you this story) entertained visitors from the White House to the ends of the earth!

Quite a place this Monterey. Come and see!

Please note attached. You could help!

Warmest regards from us both to Janet, Casey and your amazing self!

Occidental College, Los Angeles, Cal

Dear Arthur:-

Thank you for your wise counsel exhibited in the telephone conversation with Allen and me, concerning the situation — so potent for good — in reference to the Overseas School. Please note letters on the subject.

Gaspard Weiss came home full of stars for the reception he had in LA and for the helpfulness of Prof. Fife! Please thank gen tleman.

Ivan Nelson called from Washington last evening and we had good talk on the Overseas School, as indicated in the attahhed.

I am more than happy, I assure you, at your report of the visit of Filmer S. C. Northrop, and the lectures, and wait his arrival this afternoon. Elizabeth McBride will have the Northrops for dinner to-night. We will take them to a concert. This afternoon Bill Gahagan who has been called to join the faculty of the Overseas School will drive over to Salinas with me to pick them up. We will then take them on an inspection tour to the Army Language School, and the US Navy Post graduate School, etc.

To-morrow we will show them the beauty of this fair Peninsula.

You certainly have made a friend in Allen Griffin!

Please note letter to Wally Sterling. I am given the opportunity to help seek out a Dean for the Army Language School, and believe m e, this is an opportunity.

The best to you and blessings many.

How lucky I am to have had you take over before all sensations for me had passed!!

His Excellency
Ambassador James David Zellerbach
The US Embassy, Via Veneto, Rome, Italy

Dear David:-

Thank you for your letter of the 21st and for your many kind words! Also for your wise counsel for Paul Webb. We have a very special combination of understanding, institutions and persons centered in the Overseas School which can produce a demonstration proving the President's Thesis of "People with people".

Last evening Ed Murrow had a program "Person to Person" in which he presented the very charming family of Arthur Larson of the United States Information Agency. He spoke of the importance of just this sort of weaving.

Last night Ivan N elson of the International Education Service called me from Washington to discuss the "snag" and I was glad to have the chance to go over the situation with him. He leaves to-morrow for Lima, Peru and will be gone until the 20th of April.

I am enclosing a letter to Congressman Teague and some other related documents.

Harriet resigned -- pretty tired -- and Robbins Milbank has agreed to take on the Western Office of the IIE. He is also special.

To-day Filmer S. C. Northrop, Sterling Professor of Law of Yale arrives and will be with us over the night, which will give much opportunity for good talk. You know his books, "European Union and US Foreign Policy", etc. I am to take him to see the Army Language School.

I met Negri's young and pretty wife when in Rome, before he became a Benedick!

What is most important for the Overseas School is that the $448,000.00 shall not be lost and if there is delay that it shall be "frozen" until the survey has been made.

Dean Hawks of Mills College apparently is on some kind of a Committee of Counsel and I will call her presently.

Allen is up in Stanford with Raymond Spruance for a conference on US Foreign Policy. And here is the roll of the Old Calital Club!

Dear Allen:-

Here is a package of letters to greet you on your return from Stanford! They, obviously, explain themselves!

Ivan Nelson, IES, called me last evening as he was about to take off for Lima, Peru, where there is to be some kind of a conference on the International Education Service.

Also I am informed that the American Council has refused to take the responsibility which was offered to them. Arthur Adams, its head man, is to be in South American for a Bi-National Conference on educational institutions mutually sponsored. He will leave shortly for SA.

I have a letter from David Zellerbach reassuring us concerning this unfortunate visit of this man Hopkins.

When you get your schedule worked out and know what you want to do in Germany when you will be the guest of your regiment, I hope you will give it to me, and I sincerely hope that you will visit Bamberg. There is a fine experiment going on there in weaving together carefully slected soldiers and German families, worked out by the Army and the people, and with the cooperation of the Gesellschaft fur Auslandskunde. I got a report which I turned over to Hans von Richter to translate and I am very eager to have it appear in the Herald. As you know these soldiers left the USA via the General Walker from Monterey going directly to Bremerhaven. It was my very special privilege, thanks to General Mudgett, to say the Ave and Vale!

I am in correspondence with General H. I. Hodes, Commander in Chief of the USA forces in Europe and who is smart!

Thank you for making me a director of this Army Affair. I am sorry that we shall be with the Ruddocks in Montecito when you get under way.

Keep hold of honorable thumb!

Dear Tonnie:-

Attached is the brochure of the Third summer seminar of the Monterey Institute of Foreign studies, which is apparently getting its roots down, thanks to these two devoted world aware people, M. Weiss and Madame Fearnley.

Of all places I know Monterey is the one most outstanding where the world presses in on every side, "And he whose soul if flat, the sky will fall in on him by and by" and Dear Edna St. Vincent Millay, and on the rest of us too!

Please note correspondence concerning the Overseas School at Rome, and discuss same with Dean Hawks. I think she is on some kind of committee giving counsel to the International Education Service Department of the USIA.

The School was taken over two years ago by Paul Webb, the very able Principal of the L. A. Highschool who had reached the age of retirement and was persuaded to take on this job by Fulton Freeman, (Rob Freeman's son). Fulton at the time was political and economic counsellor of the Ambassador in Rome and one of the persons who brought this school into being. It has waxed under Paul and the Embassy has approved and urged an appropriation of $448,000.00 for needed salaries and addition buildings.

It has a student enrollment of over 400, from several nations, and is most important in this weaving process.

Someone has gotten the idea that the appropriation should be held up pending further investigation, and has suggested that the American Council do this, but they have refused.

What we fear is that it may be lost, which would be a shame.

Enclosed documents explain! Will you and Mande be down for the World Affairs Council Conference?

Love from us both!

Always

Ps: Read this letter to Col. Kraus. His comment! "We want a man who is expert in linguistics, knows the "structure of language etc." and is completely at home in a second panguage!"(Holds his head up in faculty) (I add!)

President J. Wallace Sterling
Stanford University, California

Dear Wally:-

Thank you for your kind note.

Here is a matter which I wish you would mull over and perhaps shortly I can come up to discuss it with you and others who may give good counsel.

Henry Houghton, Morse Cartwright and I are a kind of sub committee of the Army Advisory Committee, concerned with the affairs of the Army Language School. I am attaching a brochure which will give you information concerning it.

Yesterday we had a very fine session with the Commandant concerning the School. In the course of it there was much talk about the organization of administration. There are problems, which always exist, in opportunity.

The office of Dean is vacant. Much talk of what should be the responsibilities of this office.

Col. Walter Kraus, the Commandant, has informally given me the privilege of trying to find the right man. We all agreed that it would be a fine thing if we could find him at Stanford, and through you and Dean Spaeth and Eston Rothwell.

Requirements; Between 35-40 of age. Ph. D. in some language other than English. Understanding of educational methods. Administration experiences. Personable. Alert on the importance of world understanding. Tactful. Salary? $10,000.00 to start. Will go up.

This school has recently received an appropriation of over three million and permanent buildings are in process of building.

This Monterey could be a great center of World Affairs, and such a man could be considerable of a leader.

If you have any ideas, please give me a call. I could come up and bring Col. Kraus, Henry Houghton and Morse Cartwright.

Please talk it over with Carl Spaeth and my cousin, by marriage, Eston Rothwell. Best to you and Ann.

PS We are going to Montecito for the week of 8th to 15th and will be with Albert and Margaret also to Pasadena.

The Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Teague:-

Thank you for your kindness in sending me a copy of your letter of March 27th to Mr. Robert C. Hill Assistant Secretary of State, concerning the very important consideration of the Overseas School in Rome.

I sincerely hope, if there is any delay in approving this appropriation that Mr. Brundage will help is having the sum of ~~$48,000.00~~ "frozen" so that it may not be lost. 448,000.00

I am enclosing some letters on the subject. Our very wise Ambassador in Rome, Mr. Zellerbach, is having a conference with the Principal, Mr. Webb this week.

Last evening Ed Murrow had a program "Person to Person" in which we saw the family of Arthur Larson, the Chief of the USIA and we were very greatly impressed bybthe sympathetic comments he made on the kind of weaving in which we are engaged and especially in this Overseas School.

You and your staff chief, Mr. Slater, have been exceedingly helpful in giving counsel and in understanding the potent situation.

We spend a lot of millions for good will and mutuality in world affairs. Some goes for what is good, and sadly as I know from observation, some is wasted.

When you realize what is "electric" for good in Rome, it is hard to keep patient when a snag of this sort develops.

Allen will get back from Stanford to-night and I will give him a copy of this letter and of those attached.

With kindest regards for you and Mr. Slater

Valuable Medical Books En Route to Strasbourg

A valuable gift originating on the Peninsula set sail this week for France, its destination the library of the Strasbourg University Medical School. The shipment included much needed medical books, weekly and monthly medical journals, and books on internal medicine donated by Dr. Mast Walfson of Monterey.

Also included is an extensive collection of volumes on diseases of the eye and their treatment made by the late Dr. Roderick O'Connor, one of California's leading ophthalmologists, and a former resident of the Peninsula Country Club. This latter gift was arranged by Dr. Wolfson.

The Strasburg University and its library were destroyed by Allied bombing during World War II. The idea of replacing the priceless volumes lost at that time originated with Dr. Remsen Bird of Carmel, and was inspired by a visit made several years ago to Strasbourg.

Since that time Dr. Bird has been interesting individuals and institutions of the country in this project.

Dr. Wolfson found a special interest in aiding toward the rehabilitation of the famous library, since Strasbourg is the ancestral home of his wife's family.

Arrangements for the shipment of the gift were made through the cooperation of Robert Luc, consul general of France at San Francisco.

Dear Ed:-

Here are some letters related to matters which I know interest you as much as they do me, and I also know very precisely how greatly indebted we are to what you do, in so many ways, to get this country on its keel and keep it there!

I still wish that your cohorts could be persuaded to persuade you to take a look -- Person to Person -- at New Salem and to bring forth as a result a TV program on Lincoln's Birthday or thereabouts of this exceedingly moving little village, where these various people, fashioned the life -- to no small degree -- of this incarnate American democracy!

Whether you do the Ponds, Henry and Fern Nance Pond, or not -- and I hope you get the dramatic force of them. -- He head of the Lincoln Society, she the grand niece of Parthenia Nance Hill, -- certainly this is the shrine of the USA and it would do a lot of good to show it, with you looking at it, to the American Family.

Also one of these days, Ed, come by Monterey.

You would be amazed at the power of this community for the cause which the President proclaimed in his Baylor University Address.

Also note this excerpt from the Herald on the restoration of the medical library in Strasbourg, which Mast Wolfson has sought to accomplish.

Also the letter to Heinrich Krone.

Anyway, don't answer, please.

Helen joins in affectionate regards to you, Janet and Casey and God bless you and keep you well, for you are way up on the top of the list of those who seek good and not evil!

Affectionately,

My dear Sir:-

The other evening I had the pleasure and inspiration of seeing you and Madame Alphand and becoming acquainted with you, through the "Person to Person" TV program of my friend of many years, Edward R. Murrow! It was very evident to me, having had many years of looking at people! that you were a man of humanity, courgge, and understanding. Thank you Ed Murrow for this opportunity!

I am writing to you at this time to commend my friend, M. Gaspard Etienne Weiss who has been the person most responsible for the organization of this Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, of which I have the honor of being a kind of Educational Consultant, and a board member.

I wish very much that you would seize an opportunity to talk with Mr. Arthur Larson, Chief of the United States Information Agency, concerning the President's Baylor University Address on the power of "people with People" in creating the "atmosphere" in which the professional diplomats can do their work wisely and well.

It is to the proving of this proposition that I fin d myself happily engaged, and I am very desirous of keeping you informed of our activities in this connection.

Therefore, I am mailing you attached some illustrating letters and also the report of the second session of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies.

Also I feel sure you will rejoice with me in the work which has been undertaken by the distinguished heart specialist, Dr. Mast Wolfson in helping in the restoration of the medical library of the University of Strasbourg. This effort is now under the care of the Monterey Institute.

I hopemI may have the pleasure of meeting you one of these days, and if you come West be sure to let us know! M. Robert Luc the Consul General of the Republic of France has been very understanding and helpful. He will probably see you on his way home from Paris.

I sincerely hope that you will enjoy your experiences in America and also that charming wife, I saw, thanks to Ed Murrow, in my own living room!

My dear Mr. Larson:-

Here is another batch of illustrating letters of the President's Thesis about "people with people".

I have completely run out of copies of this Baylor University Address and I hope you will have some more run off for Believe me, I can plant them in very fertile ground.

Please note especially the letter to His Excellenz, Heinrich Krone the head of the Christian Democratic Party, after Chancellor Adenauer.

He was our guests here last year and I was very happy to discover that he had been the Principal of a Highschool!

The Gesselschaft fur Auslandskunde is a companion to our World Affairs Councils. I am attaching a letter from Hildegarde Heilmann its, Director which will show you the weaving that is going on in Munich and in other parts of Germany.

We are planning considerable expansion of the Monterey Institute of foreign Studies this summer, but I sincerely wish we could dig up, somewhere from other than governmental funds, enough money to release Gaspard Weiss so that he could devote his whole time to this institute. I wish your friend and co-worker Paul Hoffman would stir up some of his cohorts in the benevolent boards to come here and at least take a look. You might do that yourself one of these days. It would do you and your office no harm, whatever!!

Please be sure to see Constantine Panunzio of the Emeriti Census, and also discuss this program with Ambassador Mellerbach before he takes off. This letter concerning additional benefaction of this good man, for the cause of the translations will please you.

Also this excerpt from the Monterey Herald on the visit of Dr. Hu Shih!

Sehr Geehrter Excellenz:-

Ich habe, heute, Ihre schoene liebenswuerdige Briefe bekommen und ich danke Ihnen sehr. Sofort werde ich diese Briefe meine Freunde und Ihre zeigen!

Also!

I am attaching some letters which will further illustrate what we had the pleasure of discussing in the garden of the Old Capital Club in Monterey. Also I am attaching an address given by our President, on the power resident in the friendly association of "people with people".

The friendship which I am enjoying with you is I am sure you will agree a demonstration of what he suggests.

But I find especial power in the doing of this kind of "demonstration" as a person "without portfolio".

The other morning, I was given the very great privilege of saying the word of "God speed" to some 2,200 American soldiers who left this port via the General Walker and who will presently arrive in Bremerhaven. They will be stationed at Bamberg.

It is our great hope that through this group especially, we may exhibit American youth who seek good and not evil, and who may also as persons, help to create an atmosphere of good will with mutual understanding and respect.

I have written, as indicated in the attached copy, to Hildegarde Heilmann, Director of the Gesellschaft fur Auslandskunde, and I hope she will be able to get in touch with Col. Charles Frederick Mudgett, brother of General Gilman C. Mudgett, Commandant at Fort Ord, whom you met. Its a bit dramatic that these brothers are so associated!

Dear Newton:-

Season's greetings and good wishes!

After receiving your letter, the formal one, for the Commission and one from Fred Farr, I went over to see Allen Griffin and I tried to see Mr. Chaffee, but he was out of town. I left word with his secretary to give me a call when he returns.

I feel sure that the plan suggested for the use of the Pacific House can be worked out, guarding the laws and ceremonies and being sure not to start something which will endanger the general program of the public use of historic sites for the general good. I am certainly, personally, for that!

The situation here, as well you know, is full of great possibilities to carry out the President's thesis; "People with people can create an atmosphere in which the professional diplomats can do their work wisely and well". (Paraphrase but substantially that!)

I have a letter here from Mr. Arthur Larson, head of the USIA who is more or less promoting the organization to accomplish this end! I will attach some letters on the subject.

You also know that great philosophies and the practice thereof, do not come handed down from great multitudes but rise up out of the talent of individuals and the proving in the community!

Monterey is uniquely furnished to do just that.

When you come down we can discuss the matter.

I am presently to give an address before the Association of University Women, on the subject "How to sit on a Shelf"! It is certainly true that separated from immediately responsibilities of the administration of institutions, and free to do what you want to do, old men have much power and in a way are quite invulnerable!

But sometimes they can do what the young do, as I shall elaborate in this speech! They can also "see visions as well as dream dreams!"

That is all for to-day, and God bless you and your work.

Let me know when you can come down and we will have a bit of a party for you. Right now I am waiting for Admiral Tod E. Singleton, Jr. President of the Monterey World Affairs Council and looking after University Extension. I will show him the correspondence!

The Bing Crosby Pro - Amateur Calls Us Forth!

This is the greatest week of sport on the Monterey Peninsula, and we don't know of any other week that gives more fun to more people.

That is thanks to the Crosby Tournament, officially the National Pro-Amateur Golf Championship.

Incidentally, it does no harm to remind ourselves that there are only three national golf tournaments in the United States: The National Open, the National Amateur, and the National Pro-Amateur.

The national open and amateur tournaments move from place to place. Bing's National Pro-Amateur has played here for eleven years — ever since its revival after the war.

We are not saying this boastfully, although we are proud of it. We say it with great satisfaction, however, because Bing Crosby, the most durable and charming figure in the entertainment world, is the fine sportsman who has wanted it this way. And if he wants it this way, it is because he is thinking of the satisfaction that this golf environment gives to the grand people he invites to play here.

There are a lot of people who deserve the admiration of the community for the cooperation they give Bing in the operation of the tournament. They take up all sorts of places and do all sorts of chores to keep the intricate machinery clicking with the precision that is required in fairness to players and to galleries.

This is part of the teamwork that is evoked by a personality that gives so gallantly and cheerfully of himself. It is the spirit of the tournament, and it endures the varied fortunes of the weather just as the players do the varied fortunes of the sport.

It is even in the costumes and in the manners of the thousands of people who follow the players, the gayest, most orderly and most polite galleries known to the great tournaments. Let's keep it that way, out of consideration of our host, the players, our guests and our neighbors.

Not only is it an honor and a pleasure to have this tournament year after year, but let's make no mistake about it, it is a financial shot-in-the-arm to the business life of this place.

All hotels and motels are filled for it. All restaurants are busy and serve late into the night. Shoppers hunt for novelties or additions to their wardrobes. Others decide to look at property, first chance they get. All this in the midst of the "off season."

It is indeed a very healthy thing for the Monterey Peninsula as an income as well as an expression; and it is quite right and proper that we let Bing know that we haven't forgotten that phase of the sporting week he provides.

There are various ways the local public can show its appreciation. First, of course, by enjoying the tournament, whether the skies shine or open up and let it fall. If not for three days, then for one. The rich reward is in the golf that one can see, the players, the celebrities, the towns-people acting as marshals, the beautifully kept golf courses, the most magnificent sporting scenery in the world, the rich and gay spirit of the affair.

There are the attractive souvenir programs to buy, made possible by the cooperation of business firms here and elsewhere. It's worth the price for Bing's short editorial of thanks to you, let alone for the beautiful illustrations, the extraordinary art work, the lore of past tournaments, and the story about where the gate receipts go.

Buy extra ones and send them to friends. They are only a dollar — and where does the dollar go? To charity, as usual with this tournament.

Who pays for your pleasure? Bing picks up the tabs — again as usual. And let's not forget that this is a "small money" tournament

Farewell to 2,200 Fort Ord Men

The 2,200 troops (above) who sail for Germany tomorrow from Monterey in an experimental shipment by transport, hear farewells from military and civilian dignitaries at Fort Ord ceremonies this morning. Maj. Gen. Gilman C. Mudgett (right) talks by phone to his brother, Col. Charles F. Mudgett who is in Bamberg. Col. Mudgett will receive most of the troops in the packet.

Troops To Sail Tomorrow

Fort Ord and the Peninsula bid 2,200 Germany-bound troops a warm farewell today in a colorful, hour-long ceremony under a bright sky at Fort Ord's football stadium.

The soldiers, headed for the 10th Infantry Division in Germany, will leave Monterey Bay tomorrow aboard the USNS Gen. Walker in the first direct shipment of troops overseas from this port since 1912.

A chilly breeze swept across the football stadium and set teeth to chattering during the ceremony, but a bright sun and some pre-ceremony hot jazz by the 5th Division band, helped stave off the cold.

The 2,200 guests of honor sat in the bleachers, facing a stand crowded with Army officers and Peninsula officials. The stand was flanked by a color guard holding more than 100 flags—the Stars and Stripes, division and regimental colors.

Colgrove Is Head of Planners

SALINAS—The Monterey County Planning Commission yesterday elected Don Colgrove of Pajaro, who said last month he wouldn't take the job, to serve as its chairman for the next year.

Colgrove, 75, had said he thought he was too old to become chairman, and that the same applied to most of the other commissioners.

Nevertheless, his was the only name entered in nomination yesterday, and he was elected unanimously. He accepted reluctantly "because I don't think the chairmanship should be kicked around by people being elected and declining."

Short Term

The new chairman made it clear, however, that he does not intend to keep the job after this year. He said he thought the commission should choose a younger man who could serve for many years if the planners wanted to keep him.

Formerly vice chairman, Colgrove became temporary chairman when Thomas Elston of Carmel resigned Dec. 31. He has been a member of the planning commission since 1944.

Colgrove was nominated for the chairmanship by Commissioner Joseph Thorn Jr. of Monterey. The nomination was seconded by Peter Cailotto of Alisal.

Taking his seat on the commission for the first time yesterday was Keith B. Evans of Carmel, who was appointed by county supervisors last month to fill the vacancy created by Elston's resignation.

Bing Crosby Golf Activities Begin; Clinic Tomorrow

Bing Crosby's annual $15,000 National Pro-Amateur golf championship began gathering a head of steam today as the vanguard of the huge weekend crowd arrived for pre-tournament activities.

Close to a hundred professionals were qualifying today at Pebble Beach, hotels and motels were filling up, house parties were in progress and the fun was under way.

Ken Venturi, state amateur champion who recently turned pro, led off the qualifiers today for 20 remaining coveted pro spots in the Crosby event.

Tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m. the Golf Clinic will be held at the 2nd tee at Pebble Beach. Here the world's greatest pros will give the duffer "a million dollar lesson for a buck."

Everybody was cooperating, even the weather man. Sunshine was everywhere today after showers yesterday. Forecast for the next three days, however, was for intermittent rains. But this type prediction is routine rather than unusual for the Crosby.

A rainstorm is looked for tonight in the northern part of the state gradually moving south to San Francisco. Santa Maria and Bakersfield should get rain tomorrow.

Brilliant Field

As usual, the tournament will bring a star studded field of luminaries in almost every category of human endeavor. Bob Hope, Phil Harris, Dick Arlen, Randy Scott, Buddy Rogers, Dean Martin, Dennis O'Keefe, Guy Madison, Johnny Weissmuller, Buddy Rogers, Bob Crosby and many others are representing stage and screen. Bing, himself, will be on hand to cheer on the players, although he is not playing this year.

Footabll, baseball, auto racing, boxing, archery are all represented by those playing in the tournament, including John Brodie, Dizzy Dean, Bones Hamilton, Howard Hill, Otto Graham, Bob Lemon and a host of others.

Golfing Greats

And of course the great players of the golfing world, both professional and amateur, including Byron Nelson, who comes out of retirement to play in this tournament each spring.

Most of these golfers will be seen nowhere else in northern California this year.

The tournament itself gets under way Friday, with the field of 136 teams split for the first

Uncle Sam Taps Youngest and Last Of Crosby Sons

LOS ANGELES (AP)—Lindsay, youngest of Bing Crosby's four sons, today took a pre-induction physical examination for military service.

The 19-year-old, one of a group of 100 youths being processed, told newsmen when asked if he wants any special branch or specialty:

"No. I just want to get it over with."

Lindsay will be the last of the crooner's sons to join the Armed Forces. He said of his brothers:

"Denny has put in his time. Phil gets out this Friday and Gary is in Frankfurt, Germany."

Eden Resigns Post As Prime Minister 'Because of Health'

LONDON (UP)—Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden resigned today.

Eden said in a personal statement he resigned because of his health.

A medical bulletin signed by four doctors supported that statement. It said that "in our opinion his health will no longer enable him to sustain the heavy burdens inseparable from the office of prime minister."

The move was a sudden surrender to opponents of his ill-fated Suez policy.

With a giveaway faint smile on his face, the 59-year-old statesman walked out of a cabinet meeting at No. 10 Downing street and went to Queen Elizabeth at Buckingham Palace to give her his resignation.

Caught by Surprise

Eden's sudden decision caught both people and politicians by surprise. It meant the virtual end of his career as a statesman.

The Queen did not immediately summon an other man to become prime minister.

Political observers expected the call would go out later tonight or early tomorrow to R. A. Butler, the lord privy seal and House of Commons majority leader, who is 53, or to Harold MacMillan, chancellor of the Exchequer and former foreign minister.

Buckingham Palace announced that Eden "tendered his resignation as prime minister and first lord of the treasury which Her Majesty was pleased to accept."

Only 19 months ago—on April 5, 1955—it was Sir Winston Churchill who made the same trip to Buckingham Palace. Then it was Eden, the famed elder statesman's protege, who got the royal summons to succeed Churchill.

Drama-filled Months

It had been a drama-filled 21 months, which reached its crisis point when Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal last July 26. That diplomatic explosion set in train the constitutional drama carried out tonight.

Eden chose to use force to solve the Suez dispute. It failed in the face of iron opposition from the United States and other nations. Even Britain was sharply divided. strongly-healthy man, thus gone

Water Co. Opens Rate Appeal

By EARL HOFELDT

California Water and Telephone Co. today opened its case for an increase in water rates on the Monterey Peninsula.

It based its claim on a declining rate of return since 1952 when the last rate increase was granted the company by the California Public Utilities Commission.

Peter A. Nenzel, vice president and general manager of CW&T, attributed this decline to 1.—an increase in wages; 2.—increased cost of materials and 3.—a drop-off in industrial consumption of water at Monterey's canneries and at the Navy Postgraduate School.

Nenzel testified at the opening of hearings in the Monterey Council Chambers. Presiding at the hearings is PUC Commissioner Rex Hardy along with Examiner Manley Edwards.

Speaker

The sole member of the general public to speak in regard to the company's application was David B. Hoisington, president of the Carmel Valley Property Owners Assn.

Hoisington said that CW&T ad-

Car Hits Two Men On Pacific

Monterey's first traffic death in 14 months was reported today.

The victim was a 70-year-old pedestrian, Peter Poggio of 521 Madison St., Monterey. He and a companion, Vincent Catania, 72, of 572 Van Buren St., Monterey, were struck by a car last night as they were crossing Pacific street at Jefferson.

Poggio was taken first to the Monterey Hospital and then transferred to the county hospital at Salinas where he died at 7:10 a.m. today. Catania was reported in satisfactory condition at Monterey Hospital this morning. His doctor reported Catania received extensive lacerations and a possible hip injury.

Deputy Coroner Christopher Hill Jr. said an autopsy was to be performed today to determine the exact cause of Poggio's death.

Police reported the two men were struck by a car driven north on Pacific at 8:07 p.m. yesterday by Charles E. Smith of 15 Via Chualar, Monterey.

Saw Men Standing

Smith told police he was driving his sedan at 25 miles an hour or slower and that he saw the two men standing on the northeast corner of the intersection. He said he thought they were starting to walk north on the sidewalk and then saw that they had stepped off the curb and were walking across in front of his car. He said he applied his brakes but could not stop in time to avoid hitting them.

Smith said he could not tell whether or not they were in the crosswalk. Poggio was found lying in the center of Pacific street

Expectant Sea Serpent Refuses To Act Like One

WASHINGTON (U.P.)—A mean-looking expectant sea serpent has fooled the experts at the National Zoo.

They said she would give birth to a mean-looking baby sea serpent. Maybe several.

Instead, she turned chicken yesterday and laid some eggs—more than 12 of them.

The zoo's serpent experts were aghast. They immediately called in the serpent experts at the Smithsonian Institution for consultation.

There was the black white-banded serpent — all four poisonous feet of it. There were the eggs.

The Smithsonian experts shook their heads.

The serpent — called Laticaudi Colubrina by her friends—is supposed to bear her young alive, ugly and wiggling.

Acting zoo director Theodore Reed allowed the whole thing was confusing.

"I feel a little bit like a new father having to announce it's an egg instead of a girl or boy," he said.

France Won't Give Up Algeria

PARIS (U.P.)—Premier Guy Mollet warned Algerian rebels and the United Nations today that France "will never abandon Algeria."

Speaking to newsmen before making a radio and television report to the nation tonight Mollet served notice that the U.N. should keep out of what France regards as none of its business.

The U.N. is considering a debate on Algeria later this month, and the rebels in that North African territory have intensified their 26-month-old insurrection in an effort to focus world attention on their demands at a time of U.N. discussion.

Mollet gave his warning in a 30-minute declaration to reporters at his official residence, before having it broadcast later over the government - operated radio and television networks.

Formal Approval

The declaration was formally approved by the cabinet earlier in the day.

It contained little that Mollet has not said before. But it was a formal restatement of the government's intentions toward Algeria on the eve of the proposed U.N. discussion.

One new element was a stronger emphasis on the rights of Algeria's two communities—the 1,200,000 Europeans and the 8,500,000 Moslems.

Fading Hope

Up to now, the government has held to a fading hope that the two communities could become one through common rights and common interests.

But increased violence by the rebels and heightened hostility by the Europeans in such things as last week's anti-Moslem riots have all but ended that hope.

State of Union Talk Tomorrow

President Eisenhower will deliver his State of the Union message to Congress in person tomorrow.

In contrast to other years, it will contain only a few recommendations dealing with legislation the administration wants enacted. It will be much shorter—slightly over 3,500 words—than in the past.

The President's address will be broadcast over all major networks tomorrow morning at 9:30 o'clock, with KCBS, KMBY and KNBC carrying the program. The address also will be seen over Channel 7 at the same hour.

Mideast Crisis Finally Hits Main Street, U.S.A.

NEW YORK (UP)—You are now paying for the Middle East crisis.

It will cost you more to drive you car and heat your home this winter. Other products may cost you more. And your chances for tax relief appear to be zero.

Gasoline and fuel oil prices appear headed for a one-cent-a-gallon increase in most parts of the country. Some Americans in the Western states began paying the extra penny this week. Before the year is over, more than a billion dollars have been added to the nation's fuel bill. The extra cost of oil may be passed along eventually in the prices of other goods you buy.

This direct hit on your pocketbook stems from last fall's brief but costly Middle Eastern fighting.

Indirect Payment

Indirectly, you also will be paying with taxes for what happened in the Middle East. It forced the United States to curtail defense cuts and probably will result in a boost in aid to Middle Eastern states threatened by Communist advances.

When Israel invaded Egypt and Britain and France struck in the Suez Canal zone, the United States opposed the war, kept out of it and helped end it. There were surprisingly few economic effects on America in the first weeks. But there was never any doubt that Suez eventually would come home to Main street.

Oil Price Boosted

Last Thursday the Humble Oil and Refining Co., a production affiliate of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, boosted the price it pays for crude oil in Texas 35 cents a barrel to $3.25. Since then the major oil companies, including Texaco, Gulf, Sinclair and Esso Standard, have announced the same or similar increases.

Last weekend the higher crude oil prices began to reach your neighborhood dealer. In Texas and New Mexico, most companies have raised oil products a cent a gallon on the consumer level. The pattern is expected to sweep through all companies and most of the nation.

The jump stemmed from the heavy European demand for American oil resulting from the closing of the Suez Canal and the shutdown in oil supplies from the Middle East.

Water Co. Opens Rate Appeal

vertisements indicated the firm was asking for "differential rates" based on pumping storage costs at different elevations. He also said he understood the company was requesting higher rates because of such factors as the reservoir syst in upper Carmel Valley and the long transmission system used to serve the Peninsula.

If the rate increase be granted on these points, Hoisington said, then consideration should be given to valley residents who live much nearer the reservoir.

In First Zone

Hoisington also said that all of the valley residents live above the 250-foot elevation which would be in the company's first pumping zone. Thus they would be subject to substantially higher rates than persons living in the lowest or "gravity" zone.

However, he said that only half of the valley people need pumping storage, the remainder still benefiting from gravity flow from the reservoir.

Commissioner Hardy said the PUC "will give consideration to the points you have raised."

Nenzel then was called to the stand to be questioned by Claude Rosenberg, water company attorney. Both Nenzel and Rosenberg have appeared in Monterey many times before on matters pertaining to the water company.

History Told

In laying the groundwork for the company's case, Rosenberg had Nenzel trace the history of the water distribution system on the Peninsula from the time it was founded by the old Pacific Improvement Company in 1883.

He told how California Water and Telephone Co. acquired the holdings of the Monterey County Water Works in 1930 and how since 1935, it operated this system plus the system used to service holdings of the Del Monte Properties Co.

Nenzel outlined the complex layout of the system and stated "It is as expensive an area to service as any of which I know."

He said it is 28 miles from the San Clemente Dam to East Monterey (Seaside), the farthest point of service in the company's system.

Nenzel said that while this system is 28 miles long, it serves only 18,000 consumers. He noted that while the East Bay Water Co. (Oakland) draws its water from 94 miles, it services 250,000 consumers. This points up, he said, how much more costly the Monterey Bay operation is in comparison to the number of persons served.

Returns Given

In 1952, the PUC granted the water company a 25 per cent increase in rates and allowed it a 5.75 rate of return on its investment. This rate of return in 1953 was 5.31 per cent, in '54 was 5.08 per cent; in '55 was 4.95 per cent and in '56 was 4.58 per cent, Nenzel testified.

He further stated that should the new rates be allowed, the increase in water rates since 1940 to the average consumer (700 cubic feet a month) would be 66.7 per cent while the general cost of living in the United States has gone up 99 per cent.

As cross-examination opened by Boris H. Lakusta, PUC counsel, Nenzel was asked what the company would do if accelerated tax depreciation, now allowed by the government, be held by the PUC as tax savings. Rosenberg objected, saying this was speculative, noting that the PUC must rule on a pilot case involving the Southern California Edison Co. to determine whether this accelerated tax depreciation be held as savings or tax deferral. Hardy sustained the objection.

The water company is seeking a 16.6 per cent increase in rates or an increased revenue of $208,900 a year.

Financial News

NEW YORK (AP) — Steels were in demand as the stock market advanced a bit today in moderate trading.

Volume for the day was estimated at around 2,300,000 shares compared with 2,230,000 yesterday.

There was no immediate reaction to the announcement that Prime Minister Eden had resigned.

Previously, in the absence of outstanding news, the market was said to be behaving technically.

As world sugar commodity futures spiraled, stocks of sugar firms advanced.

Motor stocks were ahead fractionally.

two days. Of the 272 players, half the pro-amateur teams will play Friday at Cypress Point Club and half at the Monterey Peninsula Country Club. On Saturday the teams will switch courses. Sunday the field will be cut to the low 60 teams for the final 18 holes at Pebble Beach.

Nearly 25,000 fans were on hand to see the windup of the tournament last year.

The tournament, which has netted over $300,000 in the 10 years it has been played on the Monterey Peninsula—this is the 11th edition—is for charity. Bing Crosby pays all the bills.

Gallery fee is $2 Friday, $2.50 Saturday and $3 Sunday, or a flat $5 for the season ticket. Soldiers in uniform will be admitted for one dollar.

Souvenir programs for the Crosby golf tournament will be mailed anywhere in the U. S. for $1, which is the cost of the program. Mail orders can be sent to Program Chairman Al Privetto at P. O. Box B, Pebble Beach, Calif.

Yesterday's precipitation here while light, did prop up the year's total a little, although it is still far behind last year at the same time.

band opened the ceremonies. The 5th Division chaplain, Col. Peter F. Rush, spoke an invocation, and Maj. Gen. Gilman C. Mudgett, Fort Ord commander, then greeted the troops with "Morning gentlemen."

"Morning sir," they replied lustily.

Mudgett told the men they are going to Germany as "defenders of the American way of life and the free world . . . the United States has placed great trust and confidence in you."

He admonished the troops to behave in Germany in a way which will do credit to their country, and told them the American forces they are joining in Europe are "the major deterrent to World War III."

"We're proud of you," said Mudgett in closing.

Phone Call

A scheduled telephone conversation between Mudgett and the commanding general of the 10th Infantry Division was cancelled because the general in Germany could not be reached. A call from Mudgett to his brother, Col. Charles F. Mudgett Jr., commander of the 85th Infantry Regiment in Bamberg, did get through, however. Most of the packet troops are going to Col. Mudgett's unit.

"Hello Fritz," said Mudgett. "I'm sending you a group of 2,000 soldiers as good as any I've ever seen."

"That's fine," the voice from Germany said faintly over the loud speakers. "I know if you trained them they are good."

"They're sharp, eager soldiers anyone could be proud of," said Gen. Mudgett.

The phone call was followed by a speech by Dr. Remsen D. Bird, vice chairman of the Monterey Army Advisory Committee.

Bird reminded the men when in Germany they will be ambassadors from the United States. He said:

"You are the defenders of America, but you are much more than that! You help to form the atmosphere of good will, understanding and regard, in which the professional diplomats may breathe. It is in such a fresh clean air that they may perform their tasks wisely and well.

"Let me say it again. No group, in such representation, is more important, can be more effective in building friendly, mutual understanding and cooperation, than the American soldier in a foreign land.

"God bless you, give you ample courage, understanding and good health, and care for your friends, your loved ones, from whom you will be separated for a time."

The last speaker was Lt. Gen. Robert M. Young, commanding general of the Sixth Army. Young was introduced by Mudgett as the man who originated Operation Gyroscope, the plan under which the troops are being sent overseas as a packet.

Young spoke briefly, telling the troops their primary mission is "the defense of our homeland" and wishing them "bon voyage."

The ceremony closed with a benediction by the chaplain and the chorus singing "The Lord's Prayer. As the soldiers marched from the field, the band broke into "Auld Lang Syne."

The third packet trainees were trained by the following units at Fort Ord: 2nd Infantry Regiment, 1374; 46th Field Artillery Bn., 315; 705th Ordnance Bn., 110; 5th Signal Co., 76; Headquarter Co. 5th Division, 61; 7th Engineer Bn. 186; 759th Tank Bn., 50 and 5th Division Band, 3.

Boarding Party

The advance party of 450 men boarded the Gen. Walker this afternoon without mishap. They arrived at the Coast Guard pier by bus at 1:30 p.m., boarded lighters and were taken to the ship anchored in the bay. Earlier, a group of civilian and military dignitaries was entertained at luncheon aboard the big transport.

The main body of 1750 troops will depart Fort Ord tomorrow morning at 6 o'clock in 225 man groups. Convoys will arrive at the Coast Guard Pier every half hour starting at 6:30 a.m. Troops will move directly from buses to waiting lighters to be ferried to the transport.

One mechanized landing craft and two long-boats with a total capacity of 180 men will be used.

Fort Ord authorities estimated that the loading of troops will be completed by noon.

The transport sails at 3 p.m. It's estimated date of arrival at Bremerhaven is Jan. 29.

During the loading operations, the 5th Division Band will play from the deck of the Gen. Walker.

Monterey's fireboat will add to the occasion by spraying seawater and blowing horns.

Demos Ask Substitute For Eisenhower Doctrine

WASHINGTON (U.P.) — A proposed 34-word Democratic substitute for President Eisenhower's Middle East resolution drew cautious support on Capitol Hill today. But Speaker Sam Rayburn said he has not endorsed it.

Rayburn said the substitute was submitted to him by a "very prominent man" formerly high in the government. He said it was neither former President Truman nor former Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Father To Work With Indians Who Killed Son

EAST WHITTIER (U.P.) — The 70-year-old father of one of four missionaries slain by Amazon jungle Indians Jan. 8 said today he plans to go into the dangerous region himself to aid the primitive killers of his son.

Missionary worker William Younderian said he intends to contact the Aucas Indians to work with them and be buried near his son, Roger, who was murdered on the beach of the Curaray River in the wilds of Ecuador.

Youderian said he believes his son's death may have been due to a misunderstanding when the Indians offered them a young girl, in a spirit of friendship, and the men refused her.

House Burglary Reported to Seaside Police

Horace Leslie King, 59, of 735 Pacific St., Seaside, complained to police that his home was burglarized yesterday afternoon. He said $300 in cash was taken as well as a $137.10 check payable to Ermastine Williams, now in Kansas City, Mo.

King told police entry to his home was apparently gained through an open bathroom window.

The investigating officer noted that the dust on either side of the window sill was not disturbed nor were there footprints in the freshly raked garden beneath the window.

Police are continuing their investigation of the case.

Eden Quits 'Because Of Health'

up a post for which conservatives had been grooming him for 30 years of one ministerial appointment after another.

Eden and his wife traveled 105 miles northeast of London yesterday to pay a "routine" call on the Queen, who was spending her year-end vacation at Sandringham. The Edens were overnight guests.

The Queen unexpectedly left Sandringham in mid-afternoon, arriving in London at 5:20 p.m. Her journey was the first clue to the unfolding drama.

Eden had returned to London by train a short time earlier.

On arrival, he summoned his full cabinet.

The cabinet met at 5:30 p.m. and adjourned 30 minutes later.

At 6:07 p.m. Eden walked out of his official residence at No. 10 Downing street. He was alone. Hatless, without a word, and wearing a slight smile, he rode in his car across St. James Park and was whisked through the familiar iron gates of Buckingham Palace.

Fateful Session

The time was 6:12 p.m. He went inside for his fateful session with the Queen.

He spent 40 minutes with the Queen, and immediately after he left the palace, correspondents of the two British domestic news agencies were called in to receive the news.

Eden has two choices now—to accept a peerage and move to the House of Lords, or to follow Churchill's lead and remain in Commons as a private member.

Authoritative sources said the Queen would not summon a successor tonight. Eden remains technically prime minister until the successor receives the seals of office from her.

Up to Queen

Under the constitution, it is up to the Queen to summon a statesman who can command a majority in Parliament.

A new election is not required. The present Parliament's term has three years to run.

A combination of factors brought Eden down:

1—Britain's precarious economic position, which showed it could not stand the strain of the Suez crisis.

2—The invasion of the Suez Canal zone. The United States, the other members of the Commonwealth, the uncommitted nations of Asia—and a large segment of British opinion, including some Conservatives — opposed it tooth and nail.

3—Eden's own health. At the height of the Suez crisis he had suffered "severe overstrain" and had to spend three weeks recovering at Jamaica in the West Indies.

4—Opposition within the Conservative Party. It was a two-way squeeze from moderate opponents of the original intervention and right-wing members who thought the Egyptian invasion should have been carried to completion.

Eden's sudden decision to quit caught Britain by surprise. The country had been told that he came back from his vacation last month determined to fight through a full term as prime minister.

Rep. Hillings Will Urge Knowland to Reconsider

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Hillings (R-Calif) said today he intends to urge Sen. Knowland (R-Calif) to reconsider his decision against seeking re-election in 1958.

Hillings, who occupies the House seat once held by Vice President Nixon, called Knowland one of the most outstanding leaders that California ever has sent to Washington.

He said "Knowland and Sen. Kuchel (R-Calif) make a good team" so in the interest of California and the national leadership he hopes Knowland will change his mind.

Asked if he intended to run for Knowland's Senate seat, Hillings replied:

"It would be an honor for any American to serve in the U.S. Senate. I do not believe anyone in public life would turn it down if the opportunity came.

"At the present time I have given no consideration to seeking any other public office. I am very busy as the new session of Congress starts preparing for work on refugee and immigration legislation."

Hillings said he anticipates that new committee assignments will leave him as the ranking Republican member of the House judiciary subcommittee considering immigration matters.

Pedestrian Killed by Car In Monterey

27 feet from the north curb of Jefferson. Catania was found in the center of Pacific 35 feet from the north curb.

Smith was not held, but police said they are continuing their investigation of the accident.

Last Fatal in 1955

The death was the first fatality on Monterey streets since Oct. 31, 1955, when an 82-year-old man was hit by a car while walking across Fremont street near Ramona. Another pedestrian, Earl C. Northcutt of Monterey, was critically hurt on Christmas Eve when he was hit by a car on Del Monte avenue at Park street. Northcutt has remained in critical condition at the county hospital since the accident, police said.

Poggio's death is the fourth in Monterey County in 1957. The first traffic death last year did not occur until Jan. 14.

Funeral services for Poggio are pending at the Dorney and Farlinger Memorial Chapel in Monterey. He was a native of Piedmont, Italy, and had been a resident of the Monterey Peninsula for the past 18 or 20 years. At one time he worked at the Raghianti shoe repair shop on Alvarado street but had been retired for the past five years. He leaves no known relatives.

Non - Injury Accidents

Three non-injury accidents were reported in Peninsula cities yesterday and today.

At 2:15 a.m. today SFC Edward J. Steinke of Fort Ord was passing SFC Rodney A. Sullivan of Fort Ord on Highway 1 north of the 12th street gate at Ord when their cars sideswiped. The California Highway Patrol arrested Steinke for driving under the influence of alcohol.

At 5:15 p.m. yesterday a Monterey Fire Department pickup truck bumped the rear of a Monterey police car while both were answering a fire alarm on Madison street. Earl Reno, driving the police car, had stopped behind a fire truck, when the pickup, driven by Earl D. Martines, skidded as the driver applied the brakes. There was minor damage to both vehicles.

Two cars collided at 8:21 a.m. today on San Antonio 32 feet south of 12th avenue in Carmel. Police said Daniel Nevis of Carmel was turning across the street to park on the other side when his car was bumped by one driven by Adrienne Lemos of Carmel. No one was hurt.

Mother Files Suit Against Son's Estate

SALINAS — A suit against the $535,617.50 estate of her late son has been filed in Superior Court here by Mrs. Ella L. Haber, 94, a widow, of Pacific Grove.

Mrs. Haber says that after the death of her husband, George, 20 years ago, her son, Milton J. Haber, served as her business adviser and agent. He managed her farm properties, advised her on investments and bought and sold securities on her behalf. By reason of her advanced age and illness she hasn't been able to manage her property unassisted, she states.

In 1943 and 1944, Mrs. Haber alleges, she transferred cash and securities to her son, for which she received nothing of value in return. At the time she did not fully understand this or a number of other transactions made on her behalf by Milton, it is stated.

Milton died at Carmel Feb. 15, 1956. She later filed a creditor's claim against the estate, but this was denied by the administrators, it is stated.

Specifically she asks that an accounting be made, that she be paid what is shown to be due her and that the 1943-44 transfers be voided.

She filed the complaint by her guardian, Elmer L. Machado, through an Oakland law firm against the administrators. They are Mrs. Helen H. Haber, widow of Milton, and R. H. Partridge, co-administrator.

Case of Missing Skin Diver Still a Mystery

No new leads have turned up in the disappearance of Walter Warren Taylor, 34, from the Carmel Highlands Inn last Friday, the sheriff's office reported today.

Taylor was never seen again after a cab driver took him from the inn to Carmel Meadows beach where it was indicated the man intended to go skin-diving.

The sheriff's office said it has received no word from San Francisco authorities who are being asked to check angles of the case in their city.

Since Taylor's disappearance, Joan Barla of San Francisco, a friend of Taylor's, said she received two envelopes from the Carmel Highlands. The letters contained nothing but money, the amount not disclosed.

Sheriff's officers said they learned that Taylor was considered by friends as a highly-experienced skin diver.

Deaths

Peter Georges, a Peninsula resident since 1926, died yesterday in a Salinas hospital after an illness of a few days. Cause of his death will be determined by autopsy.

Mr. Georges was born Jan. 6, 1885, in Greece.

He formerly owned and operated a cigar store at the corner of Alvarado street and Del Monte avenue, but in more recent years, prior to his retirement, worked as a waiter in a number of Alvarado street restaurants.

Mr. Georges had no known relatives.

Funeral services are pending at the Dorney and Farlinger Memorial Chapel and will be announced later.

Carmel Council To Take Stand On Liquor Bid

Carmel's city council is expected to take an official stand on the controversial Pink Elephant liquor license question when it meets tonight at 7:30 in city hall.

The council will take formal notice of the State Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control's decision to issue an off-sale license to the proposed liquor store at 6th and Torres.

Council members have individually indicated they favor appealing the state ruling, even into the courts if necessary since the state contends that Carmel's zoning ordinance, which limits liquor stores to the central business area, is unconstitutional.

The matter is among the first on the agenda.

Tonight's council meeting is expected to be well attended. Members of the Carmel High School civics class, some 40 strong, are attending the meeting in a body.

In one other phase of the Pink Elephant question, a group of Carmel residents which had also opposed the license, are planning to circulate petitions appealing directly to the store's owners, Paul Chedester and Robert Aebersold.

"If they (the owners) realize that enough Carmel residents don't want the store here, perhaps they will withdraw," said H. L. Ireland, who lives across Torres from the proposed store and who led the original citizens protest. He said he was hopeful of obtaining as many as 2,000 signatures.

In fact, if precedents are sought, the closest parallel is the administration's request for an "area appropriation" of $100 million to be spent, at the administration's discretion in the area of Southeast Asia. The money was appropriated almost two years ago. And only about $7 million has actually been spent, simply because it has proved so difficult to find useful projects on which to spend the money.

It will certainly be as difficult to find useful new ways to spend the two-year appropriation of $200 million the President has requested in the angry Middle East. Consider the countries immediately involved in the Middle Eastern crisis.

* * * *

Both Saudi Arabia and Iraq earn a great many dollars already, from their oil revenues. The money the President has requested can be used to bolster the defenses of Iraq as a member of the Baghdad Pact—but that is being done already.

Syria, increasingly close to becoming a Soviet puppet, has already angrily refused all dollar aid. The Egypt of Col. Abdel Gamal Nasser is making similar angry noises—the Cairo press has been denouncing the Eisenhower proposal as "imper- [illegible] a specific commitment [illegible] the request for authority to use force [illegible] left open-ended and unspecific.

* * * *

All this is not to suggest that the President' proposal is either useless or dangerous. On the contrary, the Congress ought to sign the President's blank check with alacrity. There are times when a blank check can be very useful, and this is one of them. Despite the dreary precedent of the Southeast Asia appropriation, opportunities now unpredictable may arise in the Middle East where money can be spent most effectively to serve this country's interests. Above all, it is useful for the world, and especially the Soviet Union, to know, as the President said, "where we stand" on the Middle East.

Even so, it ought to be understood that the President's proposal is not a new policy, or a novel doctrine, or a bold new program.

It is simply a request for a blank check, and no-one in the Eisenhower administration has any concrete or specific idea of how or when or to what end the check will be cashed.

Hungary's Fight

By ROSCOE DRUMMOND

In the wake of Vice President Nixon's illuminating report on the Hungarian refugees, the administration is taking three further steps that the United States may do its part in dealing with a great humanitarian crisis.

It will greatly step up, beyond the 21,000 already accepted, the flow to the U.S. of Hungarians who are fleeing Soviet reprisals.

It will work out methods to provide emergency assistance, in the form of food and housing, to neighboring European coun- [illegible] precise detail so that the specialized skills of these valuable people can be made most useful — to themselves and to their jobs. Recently a questionnaire has gone to private industry and to educational and scientific organizations so that the reception center can obtain still better data on employment opportunities. This will avoid the misunderstanding which caused some firms to send buses to Kilmer with the drivers instructed to haul away busloads of refugees to unspecified jobs.

Seek Peninsula Jobs for Hungarians

Clearing house for job opportunities for Hungarian refugees coming to the Monterey Peninsula will be the California State Department of Employment Office in Monterey.

James Hemsing, manager of the employment office, will work with Mrs. Sonyja DuGardyn, chairman of the refugee job placement committee, in finding jobs for the Hungarians.

The first Hungarian refugee families arrived on the Peninsula last night. Some 30 families and 10 to 20 students are expected to arrive here in a group within the next week or two.

All employers with job offers are urged to call Hemsing at the employment office, FRontier 5-4191. Mrs. DuGardyn, secretary-treasurer of the Monterey Peninsula Central Labor Council, said that local labor unions also have offered to cooperate in finding jobs for the refugees.

Meanwhile, the resettlement committee of the Citizens Committee for Liberation of the Enslaved will meet Thursday.

Chairman Mrs. Howard Benedict said the committee will work on final plans for receiving and taking care of the refugees.

Civic and church leaders and people interested in helping the committee are invited to attend the meeting at 11 a.m. at the Monterey Red Cross chapter headquarters.

Sponsors and homes for the refugees are still needed, Mrs. Benedict said today. Volunteers are asked to phone her at MAyfair 4-2109.

Dear Ed:-

Here are some letters, I wish you would leaf over! They may be suggestive.

Particularly notice the one from Fern Nance Pond. You know I have been urging you to look into the possibility of a "person to Person" TV show of her and her works. If you or Mr. Aaron delve into this you will find a mine!

can see her

She is the grand niece of Parthenia Nance Hill, whose husband, to some degree started Abraham Lincoln on his way, and she is the one who imagined and accomplished the restoration of New Salem, which is really the shrine of these United States.

Please have this letter from her, at your secretary's leisure returned. Don't return the rest.

Walter Packard has been our guest this week and has been reading to the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies chapters from his projected book on the consumer in the Brave New World. What I wish he would do is just give a gay and fresh and easy book just telling how it has been with him through the years. What a tale that would make.

His brother, who lives in LA was stricken yesterday and Walter had to leave immediately for the South. He called me from Santa Ynez to say that his brother would not last the night. Very sad.

Note the letter to Ellsworth Bunker on the proud ship the Andrea Doria. Any ideas about this?

Also the one to Helen Gahagan Douglas. And to Bill Blair.

As one who loves his country and finds good men and women where they are, completely untrained in partisan politics, I cannot help but shudder and the thought that Richard Nixon might be the President of the United States in this moment, so tremendous for good or ill.

I hope you are able to accept Tod Singleton's invitation. We have a bed for you an d we'll bring you a breakfast tray.

Affectionately

Mrs. Henry E. Pond, Historian
New Salem Lincoln League,
Petersburg, Menard County, Illinois

Dear wise Fern:-

Thank you for your gracious revealing letter! I wish the country was covered with people like you and your wonderful, humane, patient, Lincolnesque husband, and may God deal kindly with him and give him full strength and many years!

I have written to Ed Murrow as enclosed and am sending him your letter. It would seem to me, of all places in America, where a "Person to Person" program should be arranged it would be "New Salem and with Fern Nance Pond" the interpreter.

New Salem is a "mystic" place. It is something like that city in Scotland that appeared and disappeared.

When you realize, as you of all people do, that it came into existence in 1830 and was done in 1836, and that during those years Abraham Lincoln arrived and left, and how each person in that village made a contribution to his character, his inspiration and the direction of his life, -- it certainly stands out as a work of Providence.

Just to name them, Henry Onsatt, Jack Kelso, Dr. Agnew, The Rutledges, the Hills, Bowling Green, The Careys, the Berrys, your own family, Miller Graham, etc. is abundant evidence, when one knows how these people contributed out of varied experiences their inspiration to this "Lohengrin" coming out of the Sangamon River!

What you have done to restore this village and how it is visited and how its inspiration extends over the country is a grand tale and of all people, Ed Murrow, is the one to tell it. What I wish he would do is put on a "Person to Person" on Lincoln's Birthday in 1957! Hold thumb for that!

I am enclosing a snapshot. I never have my photograph made any more. The people in the picture are Dr. John Finley Williamson, the famous choir director and President of Westminster College in Princeton, Noel Sullivan, a friend of man who is like a Saint of the Middle Ages in his humanity and selflessness, and your servant who admires you and Henry so much.

Please take a look at this folder of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies.

I want very much to get in correspondence with your Dr. Fernando Pivano of Milan. See that I have her address.

Love from us both.

Signor Marino De Medici,
1846 Spruce Street,
Berkeley, California

My dear Signor De Medici:-

That was, for me, a very enjoyable visit with you and it was most inspiring to find you so alert to the many possibilities for the weaving of friendly people, by acquaintanceship, understanding and mutual respect for the great day which can be!

I hope, before you come down next week-end you may be able to see Mr. Zellerbach and arrange for the tape recording. Miss Croce, his secretary, I feel sure will be delighted to set a time, if he comes in from Sonoma County during the week.

Here are some of the points in our conversation I should like to develop with you:

(1) The Exchange with the universities other than Rome and with the independent residential colleges of the United States.
(2) The future meshing of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies with a similar project in Italy.
(3) A possible tie-up between the University of Rome, the Overseas School, and two or three colleges on the Western side of the USA, preferably led by Pomona and Occidental, if it can be worked out.
(4) Your own future in journalism on your return to Italy.
(5) The second volume of translations, dealing with the application of the Constitution to the needs of the expanding nation.
(6) The problems facing the returned exchange students and what can be done to assist them in helping them to find themselves in that return.
(7) The "gesture" concerning the tragic fate of the Andrea Doria and a possible program of assistance in her rebuilding.
(8) The Carmel Art Institute, the Second Biennale at Naples, and the Italian location of the Institute.
(9) The assistance in these matters of the America Italy Society, and reports of plans and possibilities gone over with President Ellsworth Bunker and Mr. Zellerbach.

That should be enough to keep us busy for quite a while! Please let me know when you will be down. Do not be too modest as to your youth! This world awaiting us will be fashioned rightly I am sure because young people, like yourself are alert, understanding, wise and care.

Until then. Cordially

Dr. D. A. Bullard,
Department of Public Relations
The Institute of International Education
1 East 67th Street, New York, NY

Dear Mike:-

Here are some letters which I wish you would read and give me your comments.

Young De Medici (What a name to conjure with!) came down yesterday from Berkeley and we had some very interesting conversation, at the home of Pat Cunningham, who, with her husband, is develo ing this Carmel Art Institute" at Capri. John is there now and they have been asked to lead out in the establishment of a second Bienniale at Naples.

De Medici has some responsibility with the Voice of America and is coming down next week to work out some tape recordings and plans to set up one with David Zellerbach, and has asked me to participate. That I certainly want to do.

We went over many of the problems and possibilities with reference to this exchange business whereby more could come of the experience which would grow roots and produce blossoms!

I wish very much that you, personally, you could come out here and see what is going on in Monterey and the fluid condition for much accomplishment on the Coast.

Now that Gertrude Landreth is in the office at San Francisco I feel additional possibilities for she has much savvy, much experience and has insight!

Also I would like to talk with you about the America Italy Society and go over its program and see what can be done to work through it.

Also there are possibilities of some kind of a tie up with Rome and a college or two out here. What with (1) Negri at the University, (2) Louise Wood with the Friends Service (She was the headmistress of the Westridge School in Pasadena), (3) The Webbs at the Overseas School, (4) This Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, (5) The Army Language School which is unique, believe me! (5) The live World Affairs Councils of Northern California and this one in Monterey, and the times, -- the times which can open up for man a new heaven and a new earth. We, who add up a lot of years and can see from afar, cannot afford to be idle.

So please get the IIE to pass you some shekels and come out and make us a visit.

Mrs. Helen Gahagan Douglas,
Chateau Marmont, Sunset Boulevard,
Hollywood, Los Angeles, California

Darling Helen:-

Thank you for your letter -- so nice and warm -- for the happy news of the reception of the play and Mel in Los Angeles, and for the documentation of Adlai's record so far as the proper recognition of the rights and responsibilities of Labor! I will read, ponder, pass on to Noel and see that it gets on in the service of the Cause of right thinking, and right respect for opinions.

I wonder if we shall ever know the day when it will be possible to consider what to do, without the smear, and the sneer, and the scoff, and the diatribe and the innuendo, and such. I wonder, how I wonder.

I have a friendly letter from Bill Blair which I am enclosing and a copy of mine to him. I write -- Gosh how I do write -- about two hours at this typewriter daily and it lets off steam, and occasionally something comes of the same.

You know how it is, for you are the recipient of much and many.

I have just read the articles in The New Republic, by Gerald Johnson and Massingham, on the Donavan Book and the outlook for Senator Kennedy, and they both give occasion to think and hope.

I wonder what really was back of Stassen's move. Was he put up to it for "trial ballooning"? Was he a bit impulsive? Was Paul Hoffman with him or against him? Will good come of it or not?

I though Mr. Richards said what should be said; that from the partisan point of view it would be good for Nixon to be the Vice Presidential candidate but mindful of the integrity and responsibility and tremendous crisis which requires intelligence and character, -- Nixon could not be a worse choice or leader for this country. (My words, his thoughts!)

I am enclosing some copies of letters for you to peruse.

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, I hope will get grand support next year. It is proving its worth. Please note the second year program.

Love for you both and God bless you and all your family!

Dear Bill:-

Thank you for your kind and most thoughtful letter. You know I enjoy uterring my thoughts for the Governor and his wonderful associates, and please -- please! -- for all of you no sense of responsibility to answer, unless I can help in some way.

Helen Douglas has sent me a carefully wrought statement of the Governor's record in reference to Labor and it looks to me, just what it should be.

I am not much on partisan politics but I look as a citizen of this honorable land for integrity of character, intelligence, courage, and experience and awareness of the tremendous opportunity of our times! Our mutual friend certainly possesses all these beyond all candidates I know anything about.

I hope you will get your hands on this report of the "Resources of the World", a Speculative projection done by members of the faculty of the California Institute of Technology. President Lee Du Bridge has given me, an advanced issue, which at the moment is regarded as confidential, but certainly he would send you one, if you ask for it. So please do.

This Monterey is overbowed by many benedictions and has a unique opportunity for the development of it as a kind of center of study of the differing civilizations. The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies is in its second year and is going very well.

Its brains, and the training of brains and brains moved by the warmth of the heart that we desperately need to meet the present complex.

But enough for now! O Yes, read the recent articles on "Education" in Harpers and the Atlantic!

The best to you and Carol and all who serve the Cause of a respectable world and one at peace!

Helen joins in such sentiments.

Dear Ben:-

I hope this reaches you.

I saw Jean Kellogg yesterday and we talked of the book, Merle Armitage has designed, Ward Ritchie is printing, and Jean has done for it nine original etchings. The book is a reprinting of "The Gentle Shepherdess" by Robinson Jeffers.

There are one hundred copies and of course there will be great demand for them. The doers have given me the privilege of naming persons and institutions who should be considered in the sale -- call it sale! -- of the book.

In talking with Jean yesterday she said that she would like very much to have the book pretty much spread over the country, and that there might be certain persons and institutions unknown to her and the others who should be in on the party.

I told her under such a condition I would turn to you first of all for counsel.

So I turn to you.

It will cost $50. I understand there abe about 400 collectors of Jeffersana in the USA and that will mean that the book will presently be almost priceless.

Any ideas?

Pass them on to Jean.

The book will probably be the crowning work of Merle, Ward and Jean, -- and that is quite a crowning!

Dear Ed:-

That statement you made last night in estimation of the character and performance of Governor Stevenson just could not be better. Now PLEASE Send me a copy of the script.

But better I hope that it can be made into a platter and with it the "keynote" address of Mrs. R. These two statements are good companions!

I am attaching a letter to Bill McCormick which you might have a minute to peruse. I hope so.

The Whitehouse Correspondents will be here presently and they are to be entertained by the Pebble Beach Cypress Club -- and nice people too. Also Col. Dear Bill:-

Cheers from the bleachers! Cheers for the "hardboiled Eggheads". Very good title for the leaders in a day when brains are needed and brawn has been largely displaced by automation!

Now, Bill, I want to run on this morning, and especially while the emotions are high and skim from my imagination what comes therefrom, for I have learned through many years that there is power in so doing! I shall probably enumerate here many ideas which have already been thought, sifted and given practical consideration. But never mind. Something in the way of a grain of wheat may come forth. One never knows!

(1) Mrs. Roosevelt's appeal for the forward look, for imagination, for vision, and done so quietly, with such dignity, should be tape recorded, or better should be made into a disk and widely circulated.

(2) Also that paean of praise done by Edward R. Murrow, which was pure truth and pure beauty, should be made available throughout the land. I am writing to Ed for a copy as indicated in the attached. These two commentators, Ed Murrow and Eric Severeid are also, hardboiled eggheads!

(3) The words "vision" and "imagination" are also to be used, widely. It has been the smear to call the persons who try to use their brains as "starry eyed", "visionaries". Lets ennoble and adopt the words of smear and make them the words of glory! "The enemies of the followers of ~~[illegible]~~ Jesus called them "Christians" at Antioch, and the name became the glory of these followers."

(4) "Where there is no vision, the people perish." I think I will go through my own memory and get some wise people to join me and gather up the evidence that it is so! Now in this connection — this is important — be sure you get a copy of "The Resources of the World" a speculative projection into the next one hundred years done by the Faculty of Cal-Tek, under Lee Du Bridge's direction and financed by some of the great industrial organizations. The hope of the democratic party is not in sounding the greatness of "The New Deal", "The Fair Deal" what was done by Messers Roosevelt and Truman and their colleagues, but the tremendous possibilities of To-morrow, and to-morrow: Quotation!

"To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow creep into our petty paces day by day to the last syllable of recorded time.
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
the way to dusty death!"

You don't need to be a nuclear physicist tomknow that we have in our hands the power to feed, clothe, refresh, and give the good life to all mankind or by maluse of the same to blow the whole planet to smithereens. Draw in the hardboiled scientist world eggheads! These men, who have separated themselves from the through many years to devote their talents to the "search for truth and who have gone where truth has led" are now under the burden of a sense of social responsibility, as someone has said "Almost a sense of sin", for they have wrought the miracle of the release of the very secret of the universe, and man, by prejudice, fear, hatred, backward looking, and evil speaking, is in great danger of using this power for Armageddon rather than a New Heaven and a New Earth!

(5) How many top scientists do you know who are persuaded that the philosophy and leadership of the Democratic Party offers the Better Way? There are some wonderful men like Vannevar Bush, Lee Du Bridge, Edward Teller, etc. but what their political registration may be, I do not know. But lets remember this, It was Woodrow Wilson who drew together in the National Research Counsil, the men of science, and it was FDR who put them to work and financed the project which Albert Einstein, described as possible!

(6) Get Helen Gahagan Douglas back into wide circulation. She made a magnificent speech here, -- one of the best! Not a word of comment on the man who did her wrong! Just a clean statement of "vision" and possibilities. Not many women have the voice, or the training of voice for public address, but she has. Let her come forth and reveal to the innuendo-workers that she is a "hardboiled egghead" who sees beyond the horizon.

(7) I thought the Clement key-note speech was one of the worst I ever heard! This kind of ranting, exaggeration, use of the word "cruel" in describing the President can do no good anywhere. If he is a follower of Jesus, and Billy Graham, it is a curious kind of sound that comes forth from him! President Eisenhower has given his life for this country, and the more I heard Clement rave the more I, sick to my stomach, wanted to come to President Eisenhower's defense. Use men of discriminating judgment, like the Candidate, and not such yowlers as this one. He was dreadful. Remember the Scopes Trial!

(8) Here is one who does not like this raving against "Big Business". There are a lot of very able, very humane, very forward looking men in big business who are not to be subjected to this over-all despising. The hope of big business is the gentle consumer. The more who have the more they have. And I know, very precisely, a great many big business men, who have combined imagination, drive, all kind of special talemts which have made them successful, and who have never lost the friendly touch. Pratically every building and most of the endowment of the College where my life has been largely spent, came from "Big Business Men" who made it, and who gave it! I am sure that Bill Joyce could make a list!

(9) Now take Paul Hoffman. Do you suppose he went to France to persuade General Eisenhower to run for the Republican Party, did it, in order that the "smearers" and the really backward looking part of the party might take over? The men who seek to fix Nixon as the VP I feel sure would not cry their eyes out if President Eisenhower, — trained in the art of expendability — were to die! Paul really belongs on the Stevenson side I am of the opinion!

(10) The Democratic Party doesn't have much money, but in the writing world, and in the newspaper world, and in the broadcasting world, there are many who are on its side. I thought that it was a very unfortunate comment made by the Chairman to attack in it, CBS. Very bad.

(11) Do you know Ellsworth Bunker? He is President of the America Italy Society, and of the Red Cross. He is highly respected by all who know him and he was a very fine ambassador at Rome, as well I know. Pull him in sometime and go over the list of the Italo-Americans. They are numerous. They have gone up in this world. There is no people, to my mind, who have possessed more vision, brains, creative capacity, right across the board, than the Italians. Also recall that it was Enrico Fermi, in Chicago who made the experiment in which the Einstein formula was proved! I am a member of the Board of Directors of the America Italy Society of San Francisco, and I know whereof I write!

(12) There is a tremendous pool of power in the Exchange Students who have returned to this land and who have woven themselves into the fabric of the forward looking world understanding, peoples of the world. A catalogue of such could probably be gotten from the Institute of International Education, and at the proper time they could be informed. Remember it is in the field of World Affairs, that we could stumble and fall! The President made a very fine address on the subject of "people with people" at Baylor University. Get a copy! Also Bill, Dorothy Fosdick did a very excellent book, "Commonsense and World Affairs" in which she put it straight on the line. I wonder what her politics are. I have no idea, but she is wise, vision-filled, and the daughter of one of the best of clergymen.

(13) Adlai E. Stevenson is a Princeton man! Lets make something of that. How many Princeton men have been in the founding and fostering and building of America? John Witherspoon, James Madison, Woodrow Wilson, are three who have done much to explain, guide and advance our Country. Lets make a list of them.

(14) We are becoming more and more conscious of history in this country. Very good. Who among the various peoples of the world have looked forward and served, this country who think as Adlai thinks! He thinks. How wonderful it was to hear his clean clear and commanding voice. (I am getting alliterate like that cliche man from Tennessee!) It would be a good job to go through the writings and sayings of the men of "pairts" through the years and pluck out words that walk and wing with the words of Mrs. R. when she gave "the keynote speech"! I could do some of that myself!

(15) Take a look at this pamphlet of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies! Note the purpose. It is incumbent upon us in this time of world responsibility to understand the Differing Civilizations and their linguistics. Here we have the Army Language School, a unique endeavor and alongside this emerging civilian institution. I wish we had something like it at strategic centers all over the land. Note the list of sponsors.

(16) There are the writers! Have we a list of them? Who among the writers for "Foreign Affairs" an egghead magazine, and who among the writers of the less egghead magazine have we. Martin Flavin, novelist, essayist, dramatist, and writer of world affairs is married to Adlai's cousin, Connie Clampett Flavin. Drop a note to Martin and get him to work. It will help him too. He will stop growling!

(17) Noel Sullivan, nephew of Senator Phelan, is one of the most humane, kind, generous and intelligent persons I know! He was here last evening for the TV picture of the Convention. He is a Catholic Christian and he practices the same. He is a loyal American and Church does not determine his political opinions. He is devoted to Governor Stevenson, and should be enlisted. The negro of the world has no [illegible]

(18) Take me, Bill! I am a kind of ~~guinea~~ guinea pig myself. I have never been active in professional politics. It has been my job to try to open the doors to youth, and to help them on their way to value for themselves and others. Its been a very good and profitable life. I can name some wonderful people, who sit on both sides of the aisle whom I respect thoroughly and count as friends. I spend about two hours daily in correspondence with them, and it is a fine job for this emeritus. But the world in which I live and have lived, is the world of "education", "ideas", the search for truth", "forward looking", as free from prejudice as about any there is.

In this world are men and women who are dedicated to the freemind, and they are, as a group, deeply concerned by the recent blistering ~~xxxxxxxxxxxx~~ attack upon the "intellectuals" led by such men as McCarthy, and his now almost forgotten Cohn and Shine, and such cohorts as Dirksen, Jenner, and Nixon.

The opinion that most college educators spent their time trying to corrupt the youth, and lead them into communism, still obtains.

But if the searching minds of the savants are bound then the vision goes, and where there is no vision the people perish!

(19) I think it is a great mistake to yell about the country having gone to the dogs under the Republican regime. It hasn't gone to the dogs. Something needs to be done for the farmers, our foreign affairs are very inadequately led, the tremendous resources of the nation should be used to clean the transit lanes, eliminate the slums, give health care, and build schools, and do a lot else that is socially and economically sound, but this exaggeration merely brings eyebrow lifting and does harm.

I thought the speeches at the Democratic Convention, for the most part were terrible. The only comfort, possibly if you can call it that, is the ones next week at the Republican will probably be as bad.

(20) One of the best College Presidents in this country is Bill Stevenson at Oberlin. The story of Oberlin on the side of true "Americanism" is most inspiring. I have always entertained the idea that College Presidents cannot identify themselves with any political party without identifying the college they serve. But they can think. They can stand for ideals. They can seek to made others think, feel, and love their neighbors!

(21) Mr. Truman certainly made a mess of himself when he came out for Hariman, and when he said, as it is alledged, that Governor Stevenson could not win. But Governor Stevenson is free of his dominion and his reputation and his "give them hell", "lick 'em boys!" kind of inadequacy. No, that is not the appeal. I think it is a fine idea to exalt the very fact that Adlai Stevenson appeals to the brains and hearts and understanding of men in a time when such an appeal, the average person knows is absolutely necessary. The word" moderate" isn't the word! It is not moderation that Mr. Stevenson symbolizes, but intelligence, realism, practical judgment, and vision. These exaggerations, slogans, cliches, unfair attack upon good men on the other side of the aisle, are not what it takes for this tremendous time, -- if they ever were.

(22) Now I know what happened in saving and serving the world during Mr. Truman's leadership. Stopping the communists at the border of Turkey, and in Korea, and the Air-lift -- were ideas executed during his day. He is a man of courage. I had come to the mellowed opinion that this peppery old man was a pretty nice guy at heart, but his petulance, unfairness, tactlessness, almost drove me into the Republican Party, and would have if a. Nixon were not nominated and b. if certain other persons were nominated by the Democrats.

Well, that is enough for now. Look at me and my thoughts and consider that this is an item among the 167,000,000! Lets take him into account. Are his opinions of the "Zeitgeist"? Could be!

The world presses in on every side, -- no wider than the heart is wide, and he whose heart is flat, the sky will fall in on him by and by. I must look up the quotation in Renascence. Thank you Edna St. Vincent Millay.

Yes, this is the time for Vision, and for the careful estimation of how to draw from "intellectu" the vision and make it work "in re!"

God bless the Candidate, and keep him in health, and prosper him, even as his soul prospers!

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies

July 9 to August 17, 1956

A Summer Seminar for a practical and intensive study of Languages and Civilization (French, German, Italian and Spanish) and World Affairs (History of Diplomacy, Comparative Government, International Trade and so forth.)

ACCREDITED BY SAINT MARY'S COLLEGE • CALIFORNIA

The spectacle that the world presents at this moment is far from reassuring. Moral progress is by no means equal to the rapidity of material progress.

We have a shrinking world in terms of space. Along the lines of mutual understanding we are still far apart. The different branches of the great tree known, improperly, as Western Civilization, diverge more and more as they grow; yet we seem to be devoting less and less time to the study of our heritage, let alone the heritages of others.

At no time in our history was a cognizance of foreign tongues, customs and ways more necessary than it is today. We cannot afford to have a superficial knowledge, nor to cherish erroneous beliefs. Nor, as so often happens, can we look at others and see them as we see ourselves, appreciating them only when they conform to our own standards.

How may this emergency be met on our part? By a rational and unprejudiced study of civilization in general and in particular. A civilization cannot be thoroughly comprehended, in all its important ramifications, without knowledge of the language which is the expression of its spirit. Similarly, a language cannot be mastered without knowledge of the civilization which moulded its forms. Hence, the study of languages and civilizations should be combined.

This Seminar is offered as a contribution to the progressive work that has been done and is being done in academic fields, as regards the teaching both of languages and civilizations. It is designed for those who wish to perfect their knowledge of the world, especially the French and German aspects. Its approach is humanistic, functional as well as academic. It offers refresher and supplementary courses, and also courses adopted to beginners. It is designed for the teaching profession, the business world, the fields of diplomacy and journalism, for college and high school students and, in conclusion, for all those who wish to pursue knowledge for its own sake.

The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies was founded in 1955 for the reasons and with the aims outlined above. The state of world affairs has not improved. It seems even more important this year than last that we should know and understand foreign peoples. In order to reach these ends with greater surety and rapidity, the Institute will be increasingly dedicated to those who teach and those who study, that is to say, graduate and undergraduate students.

Courses of Instruction

LANGUAGES

The methods applied to the study of languages are based on proved results. A living language should be taught as such: French in French, German in German, etc. A language is best taught by those to whom it is a native tongue, and who have had American teaching experience. By appropriate means, the students are led to think in the language, as well as constantly to speak it. Wherever necessary, ideas and forms will be conveyod through audio-visual means, methodically, yet always in a living way. Careful attention is paid to grammar, yet the rules of language are presented in relation to the order of ideas rather than to the order of signs. Language, which only exists to express thought, evolves from and varies with mental processes.

The study of texts must therefore be carried out from the point of view of language and ideas, as well as of the arcana of a given civilization. Texts are chosen with a special view to their intrinsic value and functional significance.

During every hour of these courses, students will exercise their speaking ability on selected subjects. They will ask questions, discuss, prepare and deliver talks on given topics. Special periods of conversation with different instructors are also on schedule. During these, students will be familiarized with foreign environments and every-day situations.

(Language classes are limited to 10 students.)

CIVILIZATIONS

Courses in French, German, Italian and Spanish Civilizations.

1. Geographical and historical features.
2. Religious backgrounds.
3. Moral and political causes and effects, arising out of 1. and 2. above.
4. A survey of art and literature as an interpretation of the national spirit.
5. The social structure, its elements and evolution.
6. National influences on world civilization.

These courses will be given in the respective tongues, in language within the grasp of students. Each hour will include an oral exposition limited to 30 or 35 minutes, with questions and discussion following. Twice a week, one or more students will give oral expositions on some point raised during the courses, to serve as a subject of general discussion.

Thus, these courses will be an uninterrupted exercise in aural comprehension and oral expression, in the framework of the respective civilizations. Moreover, they will give an understanding of the forms of language proper to national thought and feeling, with a constant reminder of the ties between a civilization and its language.

Finally, these courses aim to give along broad lines a knowledge of French, German, Italian and Spanish Civilizations, similar to the instruction given to students in these respective countries. This should enable Americans to interpret and even to anticipate national reactions in varying situations.

HISTORY OF DIPLOMACY

This course will be a survey of international intercourse, from the 17th Century to present times.

Students will be given the opportunity to present oral and written reports, within given limits of time for written preparation or oral delivery. The course will be given in French and repeated in English.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

This course will be a survey of the great trends in world commerce, a review of the "hard" and "soft" currency areas, and a study of the natural resources and industrial activities of leading countries, as well as of their restrictive practices. There will be a thorough study of the economic geography of a country or a specific region.

In the corresponding seminar, devoted to economic geography, each student will be asked to present an exposé on one or several aspects of the subject, after careful preparation along the lines and with the material indicated by the Instructor. Under his leadership, discussion will follow.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT (Language and World Politics)

This course will be a comparative study of the development of modern political institutions, to include those of Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Italy, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R. Certain supra-national movements, such as Communism, Nationalism, World Organization and superimposed governmental forms, will be considered. Particular attention will be given throughout to the place of language in international understanding.

In the corresponding seminar, each student will select with the Instructor a topic within the field, and will prepare one or more research papers. At various stages of development, he will report to the seminar group, which will thus have an opportunity to discuss the problems presented by each student.

RELIGION IN CIVILIZATION

No pertinent study of world affairs can be made without a thorough knowledge of religious forces. Religion is at the core of civilization. For the benefit of all students, a course will be given by qualified instructors, offering:

The Holy See.

The World Council of Churches.

The Jewish Faith Groups.

The Mahommedan Faith Groups.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMICS

As a visiting Professor, Dr. Walter S. Packard will give a series of 10 lectures dealing with Democracy on Trial, more specifically: A Consumer's Approach to Social Organization. Dr. Packard's forthcoming and long-awaited book will form the basis for his lectures.

ADDITIONAL ACTIVITIES

Lectures will be given from time to time by eminent authorities on subjects related to the general course. They will be held in the afternoon and will allow students to meet the speakers in informal discussion.

Students will be invited to attend occasional social gatherings, receptions in private homes, picnics, etc. At these functions different group languages will be spoken.

CREDITS

Students who desire credits must indicate that fact when they enroll. An official transcript will be issued upon written application to the Institute. No credits will be given for attendance, nor to students who do not take the final examinations. All courses carry graduate credit unless otherwise indicated. A graduate student must receive a grade of "B" in a course in order to obtain credit for that course. The undergraduate passing grade is "C", subject to the regulations of the student's own college. One credit is equal to one semester hour. Each summer course meeting daily grants two semester hours of credit.

Locale

The Monterey Peninsula is renowned for its spectacular beauty and rich historical past. It is today a center of artistic activity and has become the home of cultivated men and women from all over the world. This international flavor, combined with an extremely agreeable summer temperature, makes the area an ideal one for study.

The Army Language School, which applies the most modern methods of teaching languages and is the largest school of its kind in the U. S., is located in Monterey, the first capital of California. Also in Monterey is the Naval Post Graduate School, as well as a new and growing Junior College. In Pacific Grove, there is the Hopkins Marine Institute, a branch of Stanford University.

The Peninsula offers a wide variety of attractions. Golf enthusiasts have three championship courses to choose from, including the well-known Pebble Beach course. There are also several other public links. Tennis, horseback riding, bathing and deep sea fishing can be enjoyed. Active dramatic companies produce plays in Carmel and Monterey. The Bach Festival is a yearly summer feature. Movie houses show the best foreign as well as the best American pictures.

The Peninsula can be reached by air, train and bus.

Accommodations

By arrangement, a limited number of students can be accommodated in private homes, the price varying from $3.00 to $5.00 per day, including board. Rooms without board can be reserved from $30.00 up per month.

Owing to the large influx of visitors during the summer months, it is urged that students write for accommodations as early as possible.

Classes will be held in Logan Hall, Van Buren Street, Monterey, California, through the courtesy of the First Presbyterian Church of Monterey.

My dear Admiral Singleton:-

Attached is a fine letter from Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr., Under Secretary of State concerning the possible visit to American of President Magsaysay. I think it would be a good idea for you to take up this letter and the matter of a visit of President Magsaysay to the Monterey Peninsula.

As we said to one another and commented to Mr. Hoover, it is very much to be desired that these eminent visitors to America shall include a community like this one.

The situation here, for many reasons, -- including the presence of Admiral Spruance, a friend of President Magsaysay, make it just ideal, that this visitor might get an impression of a community so decidedly aware of what is going on in the world and wanting to do what might be done to add good and lessen evil.

Conspicuously the work of the World Affairs Council ofwhich you are the able President!

I am attaching som e more letters which will interest you.

Also I hope with you that Ed Murrow will find it possible to come down here and take a look, perhaps set up a "person to Person" program and when he goes back to New York realize the great potentiality of this community, composed now of people from almost every country there is.

Will you please return Mr. Hoover's letter when you are through with it, and I will, as you may indicate, do some "follow up" on my own.

With best wishes,

Mr. Albert B. Ruddock,
President Board of Trustees,
California Institute of Technology
Montecito, California

Dear Albert:-

Yesterday I was with the Commandant of the Army Language School and he gave me the attached letter from Mr. Philips Talbot.

I sincerely hope, in my zeal, to advance the Cause of this fine Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, that I did not give embarrassment to you.

The use of this file by the students of the Institute and I should imagine also by many of the Language School certainly will not be to the disadvantage of the American Universities Field Staff and its grand purpose.

But perhaps there was some kind of an understanding that the reports were not to be given out by those who received them.

If so, you let me know, and I will fish them out of the Public Library and send them back to thee!

But if it is all right to have them and so to use them, I can see where this community can implement them most satisfactorily.

This Institute certainly is getting off the ground this year. There is a fine enrollment. It has extended its studies to include Spanish and Italian. It has several instructors from the University who have joined the Faculty. It has a good representation of the teachers of the public schools. It has received the warm praise of the Superintendent of Education, Roy E. Simpson, and the readiness of acceptance of credits, on the basis of other academic qualifications, by the University of California.

It strikes me that such an institute devoted to the Study and Understanding of differing civilizations and their linguistics is something which can help, as we make "speculative projections" into the potential future for good or evil.

Raymond Spruance and Jay Hopkins have joined the sponsor group. Noel Sullivan and Countess Claude Kinnoull have underwritten the expenses for the year. No money has been sought either from the government or any of the Foundations. But we hope to see the Institute worthy of Board Subvention which will enable it to begin functioning for the entire year.

The attached letters will interest you. We keep you both nicely tucked in our hearts.

Remember Ambassador Key? He and his wife have been visiting here with Col. Mason Wright, -- The lady's brother!

We are both feeling well again, -- Thank you God! Also Dr. Wolfson!!

Dr. Egbert M. Hayes,
Care of Mrs. Walter G. Kiltner (?)
6037 52nd Avenue, N. E.
Seattle, 15, Washington,

Dear Egbert:-

Thank you for your warm and approving letter! I will turn it over at once to M. Gaspard Etienne Weiss, one of the co-directors of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies.

You are now most happily, for all of us, enrolled for the Third Summer Session, in 1957. Also I will suggest to the Directors that your name be added to the expanding list of the sponsors of the Institute.

Please note what I have written to Albert Ruddock on the subject.

As to the weaving of the Colleges of California with the University of Rome, I am afraid I must personally go very slow on that. The idea exists very precisely, and with clear edges "in intellectu", but to bring it into visible reality, the force must come from the Colleges themselves, and as I told you, my intention, deeply seated, is to "keep out of the hair" of my successor!

But if the Colleges of the South, Occidental, Pomona, Redlands, and Whittier, do not find such a program practical and that is clear to me, I shall certainly want to look ~~bbb~~ elsewhere for the weaving. It is quite possible that we can work it out as one of the proper functions of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies.

I will keep in touch with you on this and many subject.

Please give me full information concerning the Committee on Religion in Community Life.

It was most refreshing to see you again and to meet your Katheryn, and to have that good talk.

I am so glad you had a visit with Gertrude Landreth. She spent the past week-end with us, and is certainly ideal for her job.

Mr. Daggett Harvey of Chicago, who is a member of the Chicago Committee of the Institute of International Studies, and Dr. Douglas Buchanan, Professor of Neurology at the University of Chicago, and John Jay Hopkins, President of General Dyhamics Corporation have joined the group of sponsors of the Institute.

Now the Difectors are trying to find a home for the Institute and to expand its operations covering the year.

They are inviting a group of understanding Europeans in Germany, Austria, Italy, France, England and Scotland to join the sponsoring group. Its going places all right!

My dear Ed:-

The best to you and Janet! I am so very sorry when you came out last week you did not have time to come up here. Believe me, Ed, this fair Peninsula is alive with great possibilities for the better understanding of what is going on in the world and in helping in its direction!

I am also sorry that the schedule for "Person to Person" is filled up for the present, but I am sure if you have a free spot about February 12th of next year we could set up a wonderfully inspiring "Person to Person" program for this fine Fern Nance Pond who is responsible for the recovery of "New Salem". Its a beautiful story of Americana and if it could be done in the Store there at New Salem where Lincoln got his first job, in this "mystic" community, I think you would have something which would help the Happy Cause.

Also, Ed, that broadcast on the Cal-Tek study certainly stirred up my reins! Helen and I are going down for the first time in ten years! to the Commencement at Occidental and to have the privilege of citing David Zellerbach for the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. Also for the Cal Tek Comm encement when we shall do what we can to help disseminate this important study which you proclaimed.

Please take a look at the attached folder of the Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies, which is entering its second year.

I want to keep sending you items, from time to time, but please do not answer unless something beats in you to do so.

Please thank your John A. Aaron for his thoughtful and kind letter.

We got back from Rome pretty bedraggled but are both well again and busy in the follow up on this demonstration, — a la Dorothy Fosdick — "People with people, can create an atmosphere through mutual understanding and confidence and friendliness in which the professionals are enabled to do their work wisely and well."

Best to you both.

Dear George:-

Thank you for your letter of the 21st and the enclosed copy of your letter to Arthur in reference to Constantino Panunzio. I am delighted he is to be at Commencement and to witness the honoring of David Zellerbach. I am also hoping that Pierluigi Alvera, the Consul General of SF will comedown. We must, you and Constantino and I, have some occasion for conference regarding the Society of the Emeriti. If, ever there was a need of first rate teachers, in which the Emeriti, who have the health for it, could be used it is now.

I hope also we can work out some plan for the residence of the Western Colleges in Rome, with Paul and Margaret acting as hosts, and credit given, -- a la Smith in Paris.

Please note this distressing letter from Albert Croissant. He has done a magnificent work in getting the Magazines for Friendship going and keeping at it. He lacks the ability apparently to surround himself with co-workers, and proper counsellors, and that is too bad. I am sorry that he has not been elevated in the Academic household. There is absolutely nothing I can do about that, is there?

Have you seen the Cal-Tek report on the next one hundred years. That is something which should stir the whole wide wide world. It certainly has stirred me, -- but I do get stirred up easily, for as I sit in this retirement, I seem to see, with almost mystic clearness, the tremendous possibilities which are waiting for man to grasp. God give us faith, hope, clear sight, sound judgment, charity, and the proper technics for the grasping. None of these left out.

I see where Alex Johnson, is still at it, trying to get the prisoners out of Red China. The Chronicle comments this morning on his 48th conferent with the Chinese representatives. I must warm up our correspondence with Alex.

I am very eager to go back to Rome in 1957. May we be in full health to do so.

Also we much have some time together when I am South.

Note the enclosed.

My dear Pierluigi:-

I sincerely hope that you will accept President Arthur Coons invitation, and I can see nothing in the way of "protocol" involved. This is a personal matter and does not concern the Consul of Los Angeles!

I am very eager to talk to you about an idea which is germinating here in Monterey, stimulated by the Italo-American community and by your recent and inspiring visit.

It is this!

Would it not be a fine bit of weaving, if the Italian government, or some special group — but best the Italian Government, would present to the community of Monterey a Fountain of Freedom, which would be erected in one of the open areas of the City, and with grand ceremonies, in which the local Italo American population, with the American Institute of Italian Culture participating, on some proper occasion.

We have the fountain in mind! It is now in Venice. It represents the agony of the War time when so much was demolished. It would not cost very much! It would be a very inspiring demonstration.

We can have some good talk on the subject when we meet at Occidental and observe the honoring of the great friend of Italy, David Zellerbach!

I'll give you more on this presently.

In the meantime, I shall "hold my thumb", for your coming South.

Affectionately

The Hon. Allen Pattee,
The Assembly, Sacramento, Cal

Dear Allen:-

Please note the attached letters and especially the one to President Lee Du Bridge of the California Institute of Technology, with reference to the study made by the Cal-Tek scientists on the next one hundred years! This study should be read by the members of the constituted authorities as well as by the industrialists and professional educators among whom it is being distributed, according to Ed Murrow's broadcast.

You do not need to be a prophet to realize that the strengthening of our way of being and doing, depends now, as never before, on the existence among us and the training by our country, of "brain capacity" and "creative ability plus imagination".

This is no time to smear the intellectuals and to sneer at "The egg heads". If we continue to walk down that line presently we shall discover that we have become second in the race.

This is something which can be well amplified and documented, and I'd like to discuss it with you and Fred Farr when we can get together, for both of you, for the right directing of this very potent county are most essential, and we are fortunate to have the two of you thinking of the great interests rather than becoming lost in petty squabbling.

I never drive over to Salinas without being deeply stirred by the possibility of a great educational center located on the T. A, Work property. When you think of the various assets we have and the inevitable increase of population and the tremendous need for the Country to get ahead of trained scientists and along side, and sometimes in the same persons, men and women of imagination and creative talents, — it seems as if everyone in this County would get back of a great effort to build here an Educational Center.

I'll get some copies of the Cal-Tek report and let us go over it carefully and soon.

Also note what I have written to Col. Garrison of the Pentagon who was here a few days ago inspecting the Army Language School.

So many places to take hold, — Such a mighty moment to be alive.

Dear Martha:-

Your warm and very welcome letter arrived yesterday and greatly reassured me in my "self encouragement" in sending you copies of letters which I write to friends and neighbors over the world, with the hope that they may help in this essential work of weaving the well disposed! But, dear Martha, I know how demanding your life must be and never let me add any burdens of any sort. That is always clear, isn't it?

What you are now doing for the care and cause of music and musicians is very exciting and I am sure is giving you tremendous satisfaction. If there are documents or pamphlets or some kind of statement on how and what, I certainly would like to see them!

I am confident that we have a special power in persuasion for cooperation, through these channels of education and the creative arts and their interpretation which I have seen at work. What you are doing I am sure fits right into this need and its accomplishment.

I did not know I sent you two copies of Il Federalista. I am sorry to have given the trouble of returning one of them. I will send it back to New York to Elmo Roper, with whom I carry on an intermittent correspondence, and whose opinions of what goes on in the world give me much food for thought!

Helen and I are going down to Occidental for the Commencement, -- the first since our retirement ten years ago! Arthur has invited me to cite David Zellerbach for the degree of Doctor of Laws and as David is one of my heroes, I am delighted to do this, but a bit "emotional" about appearing on the Campus after so long absence.

Elizabeth McBride is just returning to New York from Europe and will be out here in July and we will give her your very kind words of sympathy. They were so constantly close to one another and especially in Europe. She is really a very wonderful person of which she is wholly unaware!

With affectionate regards and all that is good for you and your husband,

Col. William C. Garrison
Office of the Undersecretary of the Army
The Pentagon, Washington, D. C.

My dear Col. Garrison:-

We were most fortunate in having the opportunity to meet you and Mr, Collins of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of the Army and to talk about the Army Language School and its very great potentiality as well as realization.

I want to keep in touch with you and give you reports, as may be proper, from time to time of the importance of this community in the essential work of world understanding and cooperation.

Attached to this letter are copies of statements which have been made on the subject and also the second brochure of The Monterey Institute of Foreign Studies. We hope very much that in this summer, this Institute, may get its roots down and prove its worth. When that is accomplished we shall make overtures to one of the great Benevolent Foundations for assistance in building a much wider base!

You are doubtless familiar with the Salzburg Seminars, which are conducted by American scholars with European students. This can be a kind of "return passage".

The possibilities in the development of this Institute are related, obviously, to the presence here of the Army Language School and the personnel gathered there from almost the entire world.

I wonder if you heard the Ed Murrow Broadcast on the Cal-Tek study of the "Next One Hundred Years". I was very excited by it, and will get some copies to go over with my colleagues of the "Society of the Emeriti" — and some others.

This Sub-Committee of the Army Advisory Committee, Dr. Henry S Houghton, who was for forty years the director of the Peking Medical College, and Dr. Morse Cartwright who was for over 25 years in charge of the American Association of Adult Education and also head of the Department of Adult Education at Columbia University, and myself, are indeed fortunate to have the opportunity to observe, counsel, and assist as may be acceptable in the work of this exceedingly important Language School.

My dear Ed:-

Thank you for your letter concerning the autograph for Fern Nance Pond! She will be sorry but will press on. She is a determined gal and she is doing such a bang up job in the effort to inspire many communities with the lives of great men, especially Abraham Lincoln, that I am equally determined to help her.

We'll stir up Sir Winston to a recognition that it is not just an autograph hunter but one who uses this device to render audiences amiable, interested, and alert.

Some day you may want to go to Petersburg, Menard County Illinois and do a "person to Person" TV of this amazing zealot.

She and her husband Judge Henry Pond, are of the very tap root of this American Society. They really are.

Perhaps you saw the TV show which she helped put on of New Salem. She is the author of the restoration of New Salem.

We now have fallen for a TV, and primarily to see you and enjoy your smile.

These "This I believe" broadcasts must still be circulating for every one in a while I receive a letter fromsome one.

Poor Ward.....

We are settled in again and its nice and cozy here. We had a very interesting demonstration from Skye to Rome, of what "persons with persons", without government aid can do — anyone can do — who applies some good will, the effort to understand, and the readiness to cooperate, in this business of a better world composition.

I wish we could talk to you about it and a lot of other matters which would be clearer for us, through your eyes.

Best to Janet.

Affectionately

Dear Rem:

I'm sorry that I cannot help Mrs. Pond in her desire to attain an autograph from Sir Winston Churchill.

Such correspondence as I have had with him is entirely personal and must therefore remain in my files.

Wish all good wishes,

Dear Ed:-

Perhaps you can help me in this! Fern Nance Pond is the grandniece of the wife of the man who gave Abraham Lincoln his first job at New Salem. Fern has been the vision-filled person who wrought the restoration of New Salem, and got lots of help. From my corner it is the shrine of these United States. Her husband, Judge Pond, was President of the Lincoln Society. etc.

She has made it a practice to gather the autographs of persons in public places she admires and then use them as something to render the audience, amiable and alert! She is not interested in autographs just for the same. I am now turning over to her one from you, written September 8, 1954, for example.

Please read her all to kind letter and perhaps you have in your file a holograph from Sir Winston Churchill and might like to give it to her with proper ceremony.

While in London I tried to get somewhere with the foreign officer, but was unsuccessful. I can understand his reluctance to send his autograph helter skelter, but this is special.

Mrs. Bond has really done a very special job in the counties of Illinois especially, in her ~~writing~~ writings and lectures and in counselling the people who write of Lincoln, Sandburg et al.

With best wishes,

Dear Fern:-

Your tender and kind letter containing the news of your husband's illness moves us very deeply and we sincerely hope that he may be able for many years to continue his gracious and just and completely self-effacing leadership and his beautiful companionship with you.

I wish I could get that signature of Mr. Churchill for you. Its about ten years that we have been working on it. Funny that we can't get that when between us we have gotten all that you have wanted. I talked to Peter Hennel in the British Foreign Office seeking his help but he said what Mr. Churchill's secretary said, "No Soap".

Well ~~its~~ its a project.

We are recently back from a half year in Europe. We went to Skye to visit the Chieftan of Helen's clan, where our much beloved "Rory" McClure's father Angus McClure, Helen's grandfather was born. From there we worked our way down to Rome for the unveiling of the first translation into Italian of the Federalist Papers. We had been invited by the University, the Foreign Office and others for this occasion. I go sick and could not go to the party and Helen, -- the shy one -- had to go and make a little speech.

Then she got sick and we are just now coming through our bedragglem ent. But it was worth it.

I am enclosing a few letters for your collection. I think letters are so much better than just cold potato autographs. In fact a letter is the most revealing document I know, generally, of the character of the writer.

Keep me informed. Helen joins in highest respect and affection for your eminent and most kind husband, and for yourself, equally possessed of graces.

Dear Dr. & Mrs. Remsen Bird:

Too long I have neglected you, but in spirit you have not been away from my thoughts. So sorry I missed you when you were here in 1954. Shortly after that you sent me copy of your letter to Ambassador Winthrop Aldrich, in which you wrote of our interest and devotion to New Salem and Abraham Lincoln. You have fairly poured out the very best that is in your heart in your many and continued efforts to capture for me the prize of Sir Winnie's autograph. Isn't he the old meany!

But all these letters you send me, place in my file on Churchill, which show ~~how~~ so far, no soap. And remember? You did succeed in getting and sending me the Winthrop Aldrich autograph. Oh, yes, incidentally, I like all the fine things you say about us in your letters to these top-level, important super-dupers.

Your August 30, 1954 letter presents the World Affairs Hospitality Committee idea bearing on guidance and direction for Important Foreign visitors, etc. In this letter you suggest we participate in this behalf. - - - - - - Time and anxiety intervene. - - -

Before the end of 1954 my Henry suffered a stroke, a rather light one, but devastating never-the-less! Complete bed rest for a month. Slowly, slowly moving about in the house. Much rest.

1955 showed improvement, with our hopes renewed. He is able to be about his judicial duties in the court house each day, few hours each morning and afternoon. For this we give true thanks daily to the Father of us all. He drives car only for our most urgent needs (here in town.)

Henry's energy is very limited, and he must be spared many things. With heart complications, pernicious anemia, with vicious inroads, vicious coughing spells, high blood pressure, etc., it is a narrow path. But, but-- glory be, so far so good, and so thankful he has work to go to. His mind is good, he likes his work and the fellowship of the lawyers. His weak spells appear without warning, and mean much strain, and-- I never, never know--

- - - - - -

Meantime, I have hit bottom quite definitely several times, pulled up again with determination and grim grit. I must keep us fed and nourished, keep our beloved home going. As best I can I keep my interests alert, and my New Salem-Lincoln work is ever beloved, creative, challenging. I was employed by the State to be hostess-guide at Ill. State Fair, for the A.L.-New Salem-Pioneer Exhibit. State provided driver for me, and I was home each night.

In the summers I am employed as historian-consultant for various T V and motion pictures made at New Salem. At present am editing manuscript by one of my writer friends. She writes lovely stories for children, in this one she weaves Lincoln in sort of fantasy--nice touch; Have published 2 historical articles . Early in 1955 I completed research-typing of new New Salem Inventory, employed by the state , huge task, and with an assistant it involved the better part of 3 years. But I loved it.

Your marvelous contribution to my autograph collection is ever timely, and with alert interest . I wrote Conrad Adenauer, and received from him his autographed photograph with autographed letter! This was a goody.

Our friend Carl Sandburg, gave us his 750 page 1 Volume Life of A.L.--Immense!

Would like to hear from you with an accounting of your acts and doings, health and well-being.

Recently I came across this from our old friend Ruskin:

> I wish you some new love of the lovely things,
> And some new forgetfulness of the teasing things,
> And some higher pride in the praising things,
> And some sweeter peace from the hurrying things,
> And some close fence from the worrying things.

So far, we are having quite a temperate winter, very little snow and sleet. And no bitter storms, and our oil furnace purr-rs beautifully and faithfully.

Your both are very dear to us, and we are ever grateful for the life enrichment, beauty and lasting happiness you have given us.

God bless you and keep you safely,

Ever our love and appreciation,

Mr. William Downs,

My dear Mr. Downs:-

As this year gets underway, I am grateful to many and for much, and high on the list is to my friend Edward R. Murrow and his amazing, intelligent, informed and in every respect competent henchmen who come together, at least once a year, to consider whats going on in the world. And that includes you in a very special way.

We went to Rome this year for the official unveiling of the first translation of the Federalist papers, which was accomplished by the vision of Professors Negri and Ambrosini, the cooperation of Ing. Adriano Olivetti, and the benefaction of President J. D. Zellerbach of the Crown Zellerbach Corporation. You are doubtless well informed of what has happened as a result and what may happen.

It is my impression, in this year of crisis, that the work which is done by "people as people", who are bound together in good will, who seek to understand one another, and not to misunderstand one another, and who in this fashion, without government aid, is as valuable for the cause of a world decency as anything that is done! We need economic, physical, military strength ~~in~~ to meet the world beyond the curtain, and I'm for it, but I know, from ~~new~~ considerable experience, that "people as people" possessing such characteristics can create the power in community of what Prof. Northrop calls "The Living Law" and without it, we get no place!

I want to keep in touch with you, and I would appreciate it very much if you would give Guglielmo Negri a call, and explore one another's brains and hearts. You can get him at the university or at the office of the Movimento Communita, No. 6, Via Pinciana.

We are now working on further translations of documents which show how the new nation applied its Constitution to the needs and possiblities of its changing society.

That is enough for now, but younwill get more, if you open the door!

Thank you and God bless you.

My dear Mr. Ford:-

Thank you for your very courteous and more than kind letter. I have discovered that "fan" letters are generally written by those who are disapproving or have an axe to grind, and have, in this chapter of my life, established the custom of writing in praise when I have reason to do so. So that is how it is between you and me!

Now you are on my list and will probably hear from me occasionally, and let me fix the custom, by saying that you must not let me be a nuisance. Please do not answer unless you want to follow up, and I feel sure some secretary will protect you from what I may write if it is not germane to your affairs or thoughts.

I belong to what is referred to in this editorial in the LA Times, -- the society of the emeriti, and curiously enough am really having about the best time I ever had, for free from administration duties and having fairly good health, I can apply myself to all sorts o community and other endeavors, while others, younger than myself can carry the ball".

The vision-filled man who started this effort to enlist concern for the able and the retired in academic affairs, is a wonderful man, names Constantino Panunzio, retired from the faculty of the University of California.

Sometime I want to tell you of my own experience in Europe in 1952 when I went over, to find out all I could concerning the present status of the returned students and scholars, -- for which Scott Fletcher gave me a helpful subsidy, -- and in 1955 when I went over primarily for the "unveiling" of the translation of The Federalist papers, accomplished by one of these returned students at the University of Rome, Guglielmo Negri, for which the generous and modest David Zellerbach gave me the money to start the ball a-rolling.

Please read F.S.C. Northrop's "European Union and US Foreign Policy" and Dorothy Fosdicks, "Commonsense and World Affairs", in which the thesis is presented that people as people can do much by good will and mutual understanding to advance a decent society.

God bless you and yours and thank you again for the vitamins you and your colleagues have provided the colleges of our land. My successor, Arthur Coons, at Occidental College has just been made the President of the Association of American Colleges, and believe me, I am proud of him.

Prof. Guglielmo Negri
The University of Rome
Via Belluno 16, Rome, Italy

My dear Guglielmo:-

Last evening I listened to the broadcast of a conversation between Edward R. Murrow and William Pepper. Pepper is one of the CBS men in Rome. I was waiting eagerly to hear them speak of the translation of the Federalist papers, but it did not come into the interview. I was terribly sorry that it was so, for I am sure we have here leaven that can leaven the lump!

I have written to Mr. Pepper, whom I do not know, -- sadly! -- as enclosed and think it a good idea that you get hold of him and show him what has been accomplished. Take him to the headquarters of the Movimento Communita, and tell him the full story of the translation and what is projected. These correspondent of CBS are a grand lot of men, schooled by one of the best. I have known Ed Murrow since he was an undergraduate and he is in every respect to be depended on for his talent, vision, practical judgment and devotion to humanity and high purposes.

I have just marked in this book of Oliver on Alexander Hamilton, these two sentences; "Jefferson believed in humanity without any reservations, and the causes of his great influence must therefore be sought in his faith and not in his acts. Hamilton dis believed in humanity unless it had the support of strong laws and the leadership of great men." "Hamilton was a master, but Jefferson men felt to be a friend."

Much in that to ponder, for after the passing of Hamilton, the application of the Constitution, for many years was in a time of the dominion of the Jefferson group.

As for me I believe, by my faith, in the responsibility on all believers to do what they can to give everyman the opportunity to reach his highest potential in the work of God in man for man and for the highest purposes. However, mankind as a whole will not function in government for such ends unless there are the written laws, and "the living law" is written in the hearts of those who are chosen in government to serve the written law for such ends!

It is made clear for me especially in the 15th Psalm which I commend to all and which, in "humbleness of spirit" I would seek to rule my life!

Let me copy it here!

"O Lord, who shall sojourn in thy tent?
Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

He who walks blamelessly, and does what is right,
And speaks the truth from his heart.

Who does not slander with his tongue,
And does nomevil to his friend.

Nor takes up a reproach against his neighbor:

In whose eyes a reprobate is despised.
But who honors those who fear the Lord;

Who swears to his own hurt and does not change.
Who does not put his money out to interest,
And does not take a bribe against the innocent.

He who does these things shall never be moved."

I would change as fundamental to the "governors" these basic requirements somewhat! "He does no evil to anybody!" and "He does not use his money to press down others to their disadvantage!" We have a different idea of the lending of money for interest in this industrial time, of which, I feel sure, the writer of this Psalm would not disapprove.

But the idea is thoroughly sound, that they who have the responsibility of functioning in self government must be morally strong, spiritually endowed and disciplined for their job, and the people must, in the majority respect such qualifications and choose their representatives on such respect! If that does not happen "written laws" such as you have translated and circulated in what may be an emerging democracy in your wonderful country, will simply drift into mass selfishness, and it could happen with us too.

Alexander Hamilton was a man of tremendous understanding and I think the clearest thinker and doer in government of his time. Jefferson was less endowed with clarity of thought, but certainly held the faith in humanity and the will to see the great strength of the emerging nation serve all people. So it seems to me.

Be sure to hunt up this William Peppers and tell him our story!

Affectionately

Mr. Scott Newhall,
Editor, The Chronicle,
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Scottie:-

You are much in our thoughts. Make a new year's resolution and come down to see your adopted relations, for there is much to talk about and to learn of youth.

I am attaching to this letter three very important, historica pictures, which I hope you will find it appropriate to use! They could dispel some of the poison in the air from the recent Abbott horrible affair!

I was much interested in an article which appeared in this morning's Chronicle quoting Nehru as commending the "integrity" of the United States, which was something which could spread itself with inspiration and should be better known. This I am sure is true, and I have been no end moved by the elaboration of this idea by Dorothy Fosdick, in her book, "Commonsense and World Affairs", and FSC Northrop in his "European Union and US Foreign Policy". Better read them. The idea is that "people as people" finding one another over the map in good will, with understanding and working together, can create an atmosphere in which the professional diplomats can work wisely and well.

It was this idea that stirred up Orf. Guglielmo Negri to gather his associates and develop a plan for the first translation of the Federalist Papers, which doing, was financed by that generous patron of all good things of San Francisco, J. D. Zellerbach. Its considerable of a story but I won't elaborate here. Some smart reporter like the darling Ruth Newhall could do it beautifully, if she would call David Zellerbach's office and interview him.

Anyway the picture, No. 1, shows the unveiling of the book done in David Zellerbach's presence in Rome, on October 25th. The fourth from the left is Negri and the fifth is Justice Gaspare Ambrosini of the Italian Supreme Court, and the book they hold, I own! Like to see it?

Picture No. 2, is an audience of what was called "The flower of Italy" listening to Ambrosini make an important address on the Federalist papers and the US Constitution. In the second row are Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Zellerbach and the man with the poetic eyes, is Adriano Olivetti, President of "Olivetti".

Want more?

Mr. William Pepper,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
Rome, Italy

My dear Mr. Pepper:-

Last night I listened to your conversation with Ed Murrow over the present condition in Italy, and when it was finished I wished very much I could get you on the telephone.

Something is going on in Italy which did not get into your estimation which I wish very much also you would investigate. It is the zeal that is at work in the universities for a better understanding of the nature of democracy as it has been established by written law in The Co nstitution and has been applied by the "living law" at work in the people.

The leaders in this endeavor who have brought about the first translation of the Federalist papers are Professor Guglielmo Negri at the University of Rome and his colleage Dr. Gaspare Ambrosini, Justice of the Supreme Court. I am sure that Negri, who was an exchange student at Harvard on a Littauer fellowship will seek you out to tell you this story. I will send him a copy of this letter.

Thisis a kind of "mustard seed" or leaven -- use your own simile! -- which is a potential for the development of the kind of people who are competent to judge themselves and function in self government.

This translation of The Federalist papers, was financed by Mr. J. D. Zellerbach of San Francisco, and everyone who participated in bringing it to fruition worked for no pay! Its a grand stoy and perhaps more important to proclaim than the charm of the young ladies who adorn the screen.

Ed is a friend of many years, since his student days, and if he stops by on his way back from the Middle East, perhaps you will see that he meets some of these scholars. Also the exchange of faculty members between the universities of Johns Hopkins and California and Bologna is something to look into.

Italy is marching and its value to the free world I am sure you know. What is going on in the Mezzo Giorno, which we have helped to bring about most encouraging! Also get in touch with Adriano Olivetti who is an industrialist, with a heart, a head, and without guile!

The best to you. The CBS correspondents over the world have my gratitude and I know they have the open mind on the open road!

Thank you for your prompt and very welcome letter of the 24th, and for putting me straight as to who is the young lady in the picture. I have not heard of Gertrude Stevenson Hooker, but doubtless should have. I am sending a copy of this letter to Guglielmo Negri and he will presently respond. This experience in Rome stays with me and greatly refreshes my soul.

Also I am writing to Carl Munger as enclosed and he will get into correspondence with you presently or perhaps can come on to New York to see you. As a good New Englander you might find it possible to run up to the Loomis School and see this excellent chaplin in the circle of his wonderful family.

Also I am sending a copy of this letter, together with yours, to David Zellerbach and also the folder on the work of the Unione Nazionale per La Lotta Contro L'Analfabetismo in Southern Italy.

Also I am reading with much profit Frederick Scott Oliver's essay on Alexander Hamilton, and am in touch with the Alexander Hamilton BiCentennial Commission 440 H. Street, Washington, D. C.

I see where "Bill" Jackson has now been added to the President's staff to do som e counselling on Foreign Policy. That strikes me as a very good idea and ought to help!

I am glad that all goes well with IIE. O, Yes, David Zellerbach is in New York at some meetings at the Ford HQ. Why don't you give him a ring. So smart, so thoughtful, and so very generous.

Also send me a raft of these folders of the Society of the Emeriti. I will send this one immediately to Mr. Henry Ford II and will attach to this letter a copy of my letter to him on the subject!

Also now that we are members together of "The Committee of Correspondence", I will make it a point to send you copies of letters which I may write germane to this theme.

Dear Ed:-

Commandant Walter Kraus of the Army Language School had a little conference the other day concerning the possibility that you might, in proper time, come out here with your gang and do a "See It Now" at the School.

It is a very dramatic and important place and few there be who know that it is so. I -- proudly! -- am among those who do. There is really nothing in the country like it and there is always the possibility that it may be expunged from the scene, for budget reasons or because of pure ignorance. If there is a consideration on your part of such a TV program done here, I would like very much to pour out as much information as I can and have some others such as Morse Cartwright and Henry Houghton and some other sympathetic and understanding witnesses.

Last evening we had dinner with the Omar Bradleys and the conversation turned to you and you may be assured that this unspoiled hero has as much respect and affection for you as you have for him. (Recalling a conversation with you some time ago!)

Our local newspaper owner and editor has an editorial which I will send you, in unrestrained praise of the Vice President. It reads as if some kind of directive had gone out to build him up, big and fine, -- the young Sir Galahad. Its a pure "ad hominem" and pretty nasty and the sad part is that the writer is a charming and intelligent ex-liberal. Isn't it a shame the way that a word like "liberal" -- lovely word! has come to mean all sorts of wickedness!

God bless you and your associates, and keep you well and strong. I wish you were the incoming President!

The Department of the Army has assigned to the Army Language School the mission of training students in such foreign languages as it may prescribe.

The minimum objectives of this training are :

First : To teach the student to understand a foreign language and to speak it with fluency and reasonable accuracy.

Second : To teach the student to read and write the foreign language to the greatest degree possible without limiting the first objective.

The Army Language School believes that in fulfilling this mission it is performing a key role in the broader mission of implementing the foreign policy of the United States. The Army Language School is a part of this country's fulfillment of its position as leader of the free world, for here the United States Army and United States Air Force prepare themselves to represent this nation more effectively in all of their foreign stations, for peace or for war.

THE NEED FOR LANGUAGES

As means of transportation have grown blindingly swifter - the transportation of food for life or of explosives for death - the first lines of defense of the United States have been flung farther and farther from the continental homeland. Transportation has to do with moving things which have mass. Communication has to do with moving things which have little mass, if any at all. Means of communication, therefore, have always been even swifter than means of transportation. The stationing of United States military personnel in strategic outposts all over the globe has created not only enormous problems of transportation, which are fully recognized, but also manifold problems of communication, which are not so easily recognized. These are problems of public relations in strange lands, of liaison, of intelligence and of international command. In short, the new international position of the United States has forced its military services to readjust their thinking to new dimensions in communications.

One aspect of that readjustment is the fact that military training in foreign languages, begun in 1941 as an eleventh hour measure to remedy a suddenly realized deficiency, has been continued and expanded as a systematic means of meeting a continuing need. That need may be dramatized in basic terms thus: Everyone knows what strange misunderstandings regularly occur when one is forced to rely on an intermediary to deal with another person even when only one language is involved, but when a person is forced to rely on an interpreter in order to deal with people who do not or will not speak his language, he is entirely at the mercy of the interpreter and the people to whom the interpreter speaks for him. Assuming good faith on the part of the interpreter, the person still has extreme difficulty in imparting and learning what he wishes; if even the slightest bad faith is assumed on the part of the interpreter, the person would do much better to withdraw from the conversation immediately. A man who makes use of an interpreter is like a blind man among strangers; he knows of the outside world only what people choose to tell him. More and more urgently the Army and Air Force are confronted with this problem. They are trying, therefore, to reach a position where, if their key figure in foreign negotiations is not skilled in the second language involved, at least he has at hand a person whose loyalty is above suspicion and who can either serve as interpreter or can verify the accuracy of an interpreter.

The degree of success in military liaison depends on the degree of understanding. In the case of a foreign people full understanding is based on language, but goes far beyond that. Complete knowledge of a people, the knowledge which enables one to predict with some accuracy their reactions, requires an understanding of their ways of thinking, their social structure and social habits, and their system of values. Our military services have become aware that there is a vast need for personnel who have such an understanding of foreign peoples. The need exists at all levels, from the lowest enlisted ranks to general officers. For it is not merely communication for the sake of intelligence and planning that is involved, it is communication for the sake of day to day operations.

If South Koreans are expected to cooperate with our troops in combat, in units comprising squads or regiments, their participation will be much more effective if we not only know their language but also have an understanding of their habits and psychology. If we send a hundred million dollars worth of military equipment to Turkey, it is necessary to have personnel who can explain the operation of the equipment in Turkish if we are to avoid enormous loss; but in order to gain the highest efficiency from the Turkish military and civilians involved, whether of individuals or in units, we must have American personnel on all levels who not only can get along in Turkish but also can predict Turkish reactions. In purely financial terms, it is not only conceivable, it is probable ,that one American officer who has a good understanding of a foreign people will save this country years of diplomatic negotiations and the lives of many American soldiers.

There is no aspect of military training which can illustrate better than the Army Language School that adjustment of our armed services to the global exigencies of today. This School takes pride in feeling that it is performing a service which is essential to the continued successful operations of all our far flung military establishment.

CATHEDRAL OF ST. BASIL IN MOSCOW

FACULTY

Perhaps the most interesting single feature about the Army Language School is the faculty of language experts assembled at the Presidio to teach Armed Forces personnel to speak and understand a foreign language. All teachers at the School are either natives of the country whose language they teach or, in a few cases, native-born Americans who have spent a considerable period of time in a foreign land and attended school in the country whose language they are teaching. Some are very fluent in five or six different languages, including English to the point of a highly polished Oxford accent; others are scarcely able at first to express their simplest desires in our language.

Many instructors have had extensive experience as professors in foreign schools and universities, and in institutions in this country. Others - former Army officers, lawyers, judges, doctors, engineers, writers, poets, musicians - have never taught before coming to Monterey. Nevertheless, because of the great care taken in their selection and their training and supervision, they have in a surprisingly short time developed classroom techniques and procedures that compare very favorably in effectiveness with those of their more experienced colleagues.

The constant effort of the administration is to secure well qualified teaching personnel who only recently were using their native language as part of their daily life. Accordingly the average Army Language School instructor has been away from his native land less than four years. He may come to Monterey directly from Europe, Asia, or the Middle East. He may have been a displaced person recommended to the School by a volunteer organization such as the Resettlement Campaign for Exiled Professionals, a group working within the International Rescue Committee, Inc., of New York City. Or he may have been in the United States for two or three years. Many of the instructors here, originally heard about the School through a newspaper printing in their language and made direct application for a teaching position.

Before any teacher is accepted by the School, his background and qualifications are thoroughly investigated. Special attention is of course given to his foreign language ability. Its quality is checked by an appropriate School committee, which studies a personal phonograph language recording the applicant is required to submit to the School as a sample of his voice and accent.

If found qualified, the applicant is hired on an excepted Civil Service status, subject to the usual Civil Service regulations. He begins his work with a short period of training consisting of observation of classroom work, directed reading and study, discussions, consultations, and other adequate preparation within his department. During this initial period he must also participate as a student in learning an unfamiliar language, so that he may experience as a student the effectiveness of the methods and techniques used in teaching languages at the Army Language School.

QUETZALCOATL, THE PLUMED SERPENT GOD • TEOTIHUACAN, MEXICO

TRAINING

After the outbreak of World War II, it began to become apparent that this country must, regardless of its desires, accept the continuing leadership of the free world. In consequence opinion has grown stronger that this country must have adequate means of direct, personal communication on all levels with most other countries.

Following these new principles, the training at the Army Language School is governed first by the chief aim of practical mastery of a foreign language, and second by the length and concentration of time. It is the theory in college that for each hour of class work, the student is expected to study two hours on his own. That ratio is reversed at the Army Language School. The student spends six hours in class five days a week, and is expected to study at least three hours every day. For speaking a language is a skill, a process of doing something, and not a body of facts to be memorized.

But it is self-evident that mere undirected conversation will not teach a person to speak a language. The conversation that is essential to teach a student to speak a language consists of an infinitely long series of carefully graduated steps which proceed through all the essential structure of the language (grammar) and which involve repeatedly the commonest vocabulary of the language, with special attention to military terms.

The development of such a course is a monumental task. It requires first of all an accurate linguistic analysis, then the complex incorporation of that analysis into an exhaustive series of practice dialogues and oral exercises. The presentation of such a course in the classroom requires an uncommon psychological finesse, deep linguistic insight, and long experience. The instructor must predict and control, in linguistic terms, what the student is thinking and will think. And he must control his own appearance and mannerisms to elicit in the student the attitude of informal interest, of alert relaxation which is most conducive to effective learning. For more students fail at the Army Language School on account of inhibitions and unfounded worry than on account of intellectual insufficiency.

Because the development and presentation of a language course for the Army Language School is such a complex, lengthy job, it follows that the School's chief asset is the core of skilled, experienced instructors in each language department. The continued effectiveness of this School depends primarily on the continuity of such instructors.

The Army Language School tries systematically in each department to present to its students some facets of the culture of the people whose language they are studying. For the understanding and use of a foreign language as if it were a code gives only a kind of algebraic understanding. It creates an opportunity to know the people, but of itself it does not confer knowledge of the people. It is the hope of this School that it can greatly increase the effectiveness of U.S. military personnel in foreign stations by first teaching them the foreign language then teaching them, in the language, something of the patterns of thinking and behavior of the people who speak the language. In this area, so far largely unexplored, the Army Language School hopes to make significant progress in the coming years.

This School remains always aware that its students are military and that they are learning a language for military purposes. Therefore there is heavy emphasis in each course, especially in the latter stages, on military terminology. Every student has frequent practice in acting as an interpreter, in making military reports in the foreign language, in interrogation, and even in making various types of speeches. He studies a language not in a vacum, but for definite and practical military reasons.

The commission on Accreditation of the American Council on Education recommends to all colleges which inquire concerning the work of the Army Language School, that they give credit of twenty-four semester hours for the forty-six week courses and of twelve hours for the twenty-three week courses. It is considered a worthwhile recognition of the work accomplished at this service school that colleges, even though the aims of their own language teaching are substantially different from those of this institution, regularly award such sizable academic credit for a student's work here.

RAISING THE AMERICAN FLAG AT MONTEREY - 1846
(COMMODORE JOHN D. SLOAT COMMANDER - IN - CHIEF OF US NAVAL FORCES IN THE PACIFIC)

HISTORY OF THE ARMY LANGUAGE SCHOOL

In the closing days of 1941, practically as the Japanese fleet set sail for the attack on Pearl Harbor, the first Japanese language course was formed at the Presidio of San Francisco. It was called the Fourth Army Intelligence School and was organized with 58 Nisei pupils, 2 Caucasian students, and a few civilian instructors. The first commencement found 45 of the original 60 graduating, 35 of them being sent to the Pacific Theater of Operations in the Guadalcanal and Alaskan areas.

After the first class had graduated, the War Department, through proved battle experience, acknowledged the importance of a Military Intelligence Language School with emphasis on Japanese. Accordingly, the School was moved to camp Savage, Minnesota and placed under the direct jurisdiction of the Assistant Chief of Staff, G - 2. The first official class began on 1 June 1942 with 200 students.

The MIS School at Camp Savage expanded considerably as the war progressed and, by the Fall of 1944, contained 27 civilian and 65 enlisted instructors; had trained 1600 enlisted graduates, 142 officer candidates, and 53 officers in reading, writing and speaking Japanese.

Soon the School outgrew the facilities of the newly built Camp Savage and moved to historic Fort Snelling, Minnesota. Here the Chinese course was organized in February 1945 to teach the Mandarin dialect to military students of Cantonese background. In June of 1945, a WAC class was activated. Finally, in October 1945, a Korean language course was initiated with 7 enlisted men and 1 officer of Korean ancestry. In October 1945 the Military Intelligence Service Language School had reached its peak enrollement with 1836 students.

At the closing chapter of Fort Snelling in June 1946, the School had graduated more than 6000 men who had been placed in approximately 130 different Army, Navy and Marine Corps units and had been loaned to our Allies. They were attached to the Joint Intelligence Center, Pacific Ocean Area, with headquarters in Hawaii. Teams of at least 10 linguists were selected for each of the headquarters of more than a score of infantry divisions in the Pacific. Other language teams were assigned to the Joint Intelligence Collecting Agency which later combined with British Intelligence to form the South East Asia Translator and Interrogator Center with headquarters in New Delhi. Teams were assigned to Merril's Marauders, Mar's Task Force, Far Eastern Air Forces and the China-Burma-India Theater. During the Attu and Kiska campaigns in Alaska, nearly 50 MISLS graduates were working out of the advance Alaskan Department which had its headquarters in ADAK.

In June 1946, the School was transferred from Fort Snelling to its present location, the Presidio of Monterey. In September 1947, other Army agencies desiring to send students for language training, the MISLS was placed under direct control of Army Field Forces and the name changed to Army Language School. Since that time the School has been further expanded qualitatively as well as quantitatively to its present strength and organization.

Today 28 ~~24~~ languages are taught and a total of 475 ~~349~~ instructors are employed. As of this writing, there are 2000 ~~1299~~ students attending classes. The School has its own reproduction plant for producing text books and training aids, and its own recording section for making phonograph records of all the languages, these records forming an integral part of each course. In short, the Army Language School has grown from a modest beginning into a large sized and well organized institution. It is unique in type and already is serving as an inspiration and guide to instructors and learners of language throughout the academic world.

THE FUTURE

There seems little doubt that the teaching of foreign languages to members of the armed forces started hurriedly in 1941 by the Army, must continue. The need for men who can speak foreign languages is growing year by year. Since 1947 the Army Language School has grown from a student body of 350 to one of 1400. Estimates of the future size of the Army Language School vary withing wide limits; but we are now planning a school to meet future Department of the Army requirements, housed in suitably designed and permanently constructed buildings. It will be possible, should higher authority so decide, to include in the student body persons in other branches of the government who are selected for duty in foreign lands.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York City, N. Y.

Dear Ed:-

Thank you and Janet for your Christmas card. We are very pleased to be on the list. The best of years for you both and for Growing Casey.

We are back home now and seem to be coming up for air. Sometime I want to write to you a report on what happened in Rome when these excellent people translated and published without material profit The Federalist Papers. Its a story well worth telling and it comes back to the Exchange Program, for the genius of it was Prof. Guglielmo Negri who had been an exchange student at Harvard!

Fred Farr gave me your letter concerning the language school. If you ever do find it something you want to tell the world about, be sure to let me write you fully about it and help as I may.

Helen says that you must not come to Carmel unless you stay with us, but I tell her that when you do this sort of thing you bring your gang and you work like fury and have little time for the amenities.

Anyway, Believe me, this Army Language School, with 18,000 graduates, an annual "in-put" of 2,500 personnel, with 500 teachers teaching some 30 languages, and all else involved is a story which should give all of us much encouragement.

But there are elements of drama, distress, difficulties, which also the powers that be should know about.

If you see Senator Alexander Smith of New Jersey he can tell you some of the problems.

When you add a few years and get ready to retire cconsult me! I have experience and ideas.

Affectionately

Dear Fred:-

Your letter with ehcmlsure of the one from Ed Murrow, and the pamphlet on California Politics by Prof. Harris arrived yesterday. I read the pamphlet last evening and am writing as enclosed to Ed on the subject of the Language School. I will put in a call for Col. Kraus this morning and see if he cannot lunch with me.

The suddenly dropped teachers are in great distress and this committee of the Army Advisory Committee, Morse Cartwright, Henry Houghton and I are trying to do what we can. Kraus told me that there was some hope through the CIA. I will keep you informed.

The School is even in its inadequate condition, a most important institution and has done, is doing and will continue to doni feel sure some of the best instruction in languages and what languages themselves exhibit! that is done in the Country. But you know alll that.

Congratualtions for you and Allen Pattee on the saving of Asilmmar. There is a trend now upward towards the things of the spirit, and Asilomar is greatly needed -- even more than it has been. I have been in and out of it for lo these forty years and I certainly know its worth.

I am no good on partisan politics as well you know, but I can see pretty clearly a good man and a capable one and you are in that category and so is Allen, -- so as you sit on the two sides of the aisle and work for what is ri ght, just and proper, you are doing a great work and God bless you both!

If Ed does come out I know I can help and will want to.

David Hulbuud did a story for the SatEvPost which was never published and Demmaree Best (Occidental) did on that was!

The best to you and Janet and the children and the kith and kin. Lets lunch one of these days and let me explain to you the arts and crafts of the retired!

My dear David:-

I have just read in The Chronicle of the blow up of the Italo American Institute. This is something much to be regretted. Is there anything we can do in the way of salvage.

Just before leaving for Europe I went up to SF and met with Muzi-Falconi and Frank de Bellis and explored with them the idea of the Institute and agreed to go on the Board. I had heard nothing since. They told me that you and Helen Russell had agreed to go on said Board, and that was enough for me.

Such an institute in San Francisco strikes me as right as right, and that it should be precisely and entirely an expression of this country and not in any way a Italy controlled affair.

Such an institute should also be completely clean of any exploitation for personal advantage and it seemed to me should prove itself before any approach to one of the benevolent foundations.

The family of Sig. Pierluigi Alvera are friends of friends of ours and Helen had tea with his fatherand mother in Rome and liked them immensely. I saw him once and liked him very much too! It would be too bad if there developed antipathies among those who seek good and not evil.

This collection that Frank de Bellis has developed is certainly special, and it was my impression that he really wanted to do something for this Cause, but he needed some wise counsel as to ways and means, and a lot else.

I wish very much that you would come down here, have lunch with me at the Old Capital Club, see how well it is going and give opportunity for conversation on many matters which mutuallyinterest us. Blessings on you for 1956 and beyond.

My dear Mr. Hand:-

How very kind of you to write me this letter concerning the broadcast, "This I Believe". It is my impression that these statements of faith have been really effective for the cause of hope, and I am very grateful to the editors who invited me to participate.

I wish you knew Ed Murrow. The last thing in the world he would do is gloss over the importance of the independent college, and I am sure there was no intention -- on his part or mine -- in leaving out the fact that I am an alumnus of Lafayette.

I wholly agree with you that these colleges are part of the very essential being of our country and that we are in a time when everyone who understands -- and may there number increase -- should do all possible to add to their power.

The new Association which is headed by Wilson Compton is a step and a very important one in that direction!

You will be interested to know that our mutual friend, John G. Conner of Trenton called me a short time ago to tell me that he is spending the night here on The Peninsula. He is, I think our oldest living alumnus and must be somewhere near 90 years of age. I will see him presently.

Our life here on the bleachers is a very satisfying one and I find much to occupy my thoughts and time since retirement from the Presidency of Occidental College. As perhaps you also know it is to no small degree a child of Lafayette in that its chief founder was William Stuart Young a graduate of our Alma Mater.

Thank you again for your kind letter which I will send on to Ed.

BAYARD HAND
ATTORNEY AT LAW
~~[illegible]~~ 63 West River St
WILKES-BARRE, PA.

My dear Doctor Bird;

May I thank you for your broadcast last evening under the Ed Murrow "This I Believe" caption? It was wholly an uplift and so good for those bordering on skepticism.

There was however, one small factor that had an inclination to upset me, but it was not of your making.

In his introduction of you Murrow told of your place of birth, then said "he was educated at Princeton Theological Seminary" , with no reference whatsoever to Lafayette.

I am too much of an admirer of Murrow to believe that he intentionally ignored our small College, but, it would seem that he, like most cosmopolitans, can only see the BIG- the large City, the Overcrowded University, the HUGE , the Mammoth.

Lafayette has had a terrific fight to gain the least recognition, just because it is small,apparently. So, when the opportunity arises whereby it can be recognized by having an eminent man mentioned as an Alumnus, I resent it when a deliberate omission occurs.

If you have the opportunity and believe it might help, wont you call this to the attention of Mr Murrow? No reference to your education should have been made at all unless it included your basic training wherever it was attained.

Thank you,nwertheless,for your words of help.

Very truly,

Bayard Hand

Mr. Donald D. Walsh,
Associate Secretary
The Modern Language Association of American
6 Washington Square North, New York, 3, NY

My dear Mr. Walsh:-

Thank you very much for your most welcome letter of the 20th concerning the Army Language School. I think it is a matter of great importance to the country, to the association which you represent and to the best possible functioning of this important governmental agency that the work done here at the ALS shall be fully understood by your association and that the ALS shall have the benefit of your counsel.

I am enclosing an informal statement which was made to my friend H. Alexander Smith, Jr. who has inspected the school and who wholly as an interested citizen is seeking to understand its worth and add thereto!

When there was the hazard of its very existence, his father, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, interested himself and was very helpful in explaining matters where it was important that such be done.

There are many problems. Some are greatly in need of immediate solution.

The statistics briefly are 500 teachers, 2,500 students, 30 languages. But there are possibilities of considerable change.

I am enclosing also General Wyman's recent personal letter which reveals his own great interest. He is about to move to the Continental Command where he can be even more helpful.

I am expecting to be in New York en route to Europe about the 20th of July and there is much that could be said in conversation which I would rather not elaborate in a letter. Certainly this is something UNESCO should fully understand and support!

Please return the enclosed and I think they should not receive wide circulation!

With best wishes,

Cordially

Mr. Philips Talbot,

My dear Mr. Talbot:-

Thank you very much for your kind and helpful response to my letter concerning the reports made by you and your colleagues.

I will pass on your letter to Albert Ruddock who is, I know very sincerely interested in this program and what comes of it.

I read Mr. Bayne's reports of Sicily, Italy as a whole, -- the Vanoni plan -- and of Florence and have given them to several persons who will benefit from them.

I want very much to meet Mr. Bayne and will work out some plan whereby I shall do so.

We are to be the guests of Adriano Olivetti in Ivrea and Naples, and I am doing some informal speaking at the University of Turin and in Rome and elsewhere.

What I want to do is illustrate, as I wrote you, what anyone who gets about can accomplish in this necessary weaving, as a private non-governmental, or especially appointed citizen ~~can do~~.

While in Rome we are to have considerable of a party at the unveiling of the first Italian translation of the Federalist papers, for which David Zellerbach gave the money, and the whole affair planned by Prof. Guglielmo Negri of the Department of Political Science at the University of Rome. He is, himself, a kind of "illustration" for he was a Fulbright student at Harvard University.

I am sorry to miss you in New York, but will keep in touch with you. If you go to Karachi there is a fine young art teacher there named Nazraat Farooki, who was a year or so ago our guest.

I wish I knew precisely what the overthrow of the Scelba government means to our side!

Thank you again and with best wishes and may you have such an experience in India as you desire.

Dear Rem:

You will be interested in the enclosed clipping. But you probably know all about it already. Good. I will go and hear Sen. Fulbright.

Do you happen to know a Hamilton College alumnus living in Carmel by the name of John T. Bissell? In filling out the Hamilton questionnaire he writes: " I came to the West Coast after 33 years in the Army as a good place to retire. I still own a camp in the Adirondacks and have gone back each summer since coming to Calif. We like it here." His mail address is Route 1, Box 119, Carmel. His class was Hamilton '15.

Will write you a real letter in a day or two.

Last evening we listened to "This I Believe." It was Pat Frank a buddy of Ed Murrow's over in Germany. Only fair. I really think TIB has run its course. You can not keep such a good thing going indefinitely. Stop it, before it peters out. Them's my sentiments.

More again soon.

Affectionately,

Dear George:-

Thank you for your letter and enclosure. It is not clear which Monday. If the Monday is past then relax, but if it is this coming Monday I hope you will have a talk with Senator Fulbright.

Find out if he is coming North. If so I want very much to see him.

There is so much brewing on this Peninsula that is important in itself and can be illustrative of what any community could do in this highly potent situation.

I am enclosing some letters on the subject.

Also I sent a package of them to Raymond with the word to pass on to you!

Also I am sending your letter concerning TIB to Ed. I wholly agree.

I have not heard any final word about the loss of the Ward Wheelock yacht at sea and have asked Raymond Swing to tell me all that he knows. I am afraid it is pure tragedy.

Keep your fingers crossed. We have made reservations for Europe via the Parthia on the 13th of May and for the return via the Nieuw Amsterdam in late October. Ted Ogden has most generously given us for our use his Jaguar which he keeps parked in Paris.

We will go unless something unexpected -- all kinds of unexpectedness possible! -- happens. Also if Elizabeth wants to stay here through the summer we stay.

You must read "Something Missing". Its tremendous.

Yes I know General Bissell. His brother Leet is a very good friend. Leet also went to Hamilton as you know.

I do not know the General very well.

That is all for now. Cheers.

Too bad about Mendes France. These French are so incapable of functioning as a democracy. Many reasons; (1) Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, (2) Loss of valuable nobless oblige in the Revolution along with the deaadents, (3) Loss of some of their finest in the several wars, (4) Lack of unity -- Bonapartists, Bourbonists, revolutionists, (5) fear of enemies, -- O, many reasons.

Affectionately

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM
485 Madison Avenue, New York, NY

Dear Ed:-

Thank you and Janet for your Christmas card and greeting.

I received a good letter from Ward just before he took off for distant places and his wandering in Odyssean waters. What a tour that is destined to be!

With his letter he sent me the printed statement concerning This I Believe, and the problems and the plans.

I can well appreciate his convictions, which you and Raymond share, that this broadcast should not in any way have a commercial tinge. It would not worry me, however, for there are many ways in which faith is proved!

But if it costs $100,000 for so brief a time, and it is helping, as I know it is, to turn the world from hate, malice, fear and unfaith, to good will and the results of good will, no amount of money spent on it is too much.

When I think of the vast coffers of the Ford Foundation and of such funds as the Fund for the Republic and the Fund for Adult Education, and realize how much really practical inspiration comes from what you three musketeers are doing, it seems to me that a few hundred thousand dollars could well be given to you, so that there would be no interruption in this fine endeavor.

Also now that Nelson Rockefeller has taken this new job for which he is so especially fitted, I can see where he could give his cooperation. His distinguished and mighty father, -- mighty in his generosity -- has given this State several millions to save the Sequoias, and now twenty millions for the support of theological education -- with which I am familiar, and I should not be at all surprised if he would back to the limit your broadcast -- THIS I BELIEVE -- if the great Ed Murrow were to suggest that he give it consideration.

I happen to know that he is one of your admirers, as well he should be!

Helen and I plan to go back to Rome in May, if we can work it out and we probably can, for this "unveiling" of the Italian translation of The Federalist. I wish you could do a story on it!

Some enclosures. Don't, please, bother to answer. You have enough on your mind! Affectionate regards for you all, and such strength from your strength!

So

Mrs. Henry Potter Russell,

Dear Helen:-

When Nelson Rockefeller took over his present appointment with the State Department, I wrote him telling him something of the several centers in America through which effort was made to give very much needed care and hospitality to the steady stream of visitors to this country from many lands.

I emphasized, what you of all people know to be true, that we have in these centers and what they do a most valuable agency for building world understanding and cooperation.

They illustrate what can be done, at relatively little expense all over the country. They have available, in these visiors, selected and friendly persons, in the student and in the leader categories, and through the cooperation of various community organizations, colleges and universities, etc. they are enabled to get below the surface, to know life in our homes, and to be able to return to their own lands as informed and well disposed ambassadors.

It would, therefore, seem to me that he would be very wise in giving himself every opportunity to observe what these several offices are doing. I, therefore, sent him several of Harriet's reports and have followed up with this unending letter which I am enclosing.

He has graciously opened the door for further correspondence and I certainly intend to enter the same.

I wish you and Harriet would give this letter from him, mine to him, and this to you some consideration and when I see you on Friday at ten, perhaps we can develop further possibilities!

It seems such a shame to m e that Harriet and her staff must give time and emotions and efforts to get the dollars for so important a work when they are so desperately needed in serving with their special and effective brand of hospitality these potential friends from all parts of the available world.

I know Nelson Rockefeller very slightly but he is a man, with the silver spoon, who justifies the possession of it!

So do you!

Mr. Nelson A. Rockefeller,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Rockefeller:-

Thank you for your encouraging letter of the 5th, and the implied invitation to carry on the writing to you of what may be on my mind! That I shall do and with much satisfaction. But I certainly do not want to add to the excessive burdens which you have so generously assumed for the service of this country, which we would preserve, advance and defend.

For many years you have been in my thoughts, -- in fact since I met you in Los Angeles when, as a member of the local group concerned with better relations with South America, you appeared and spoke to us. Also because of my friendship for Kenneth Holland, a former student body President at Occidental, whose association with you, has been for him so great an inspiration.

Now in this reporting to you, I hope someone on your staff can be selected to whom my letters will come, and who can brief you on what in them may be regarded as proper for your desk.

Also I hope one of these days when you are passing through San Francisco, I may be able to have an opportunity for a conference, for there is much on my mind, and I carry certain convictions which I would like to consider with you!

In order that this letter may not run on forever, I will just indicate what they are briefly, and perhaps from time to time write you more in detail about them, for I feel sure, from observation and proving that they are very important for the cause to which your life is now dedicated.

(1) The International Hospitality Centers, such as the one in San Francisco presided over by Harriet Eliel, with Helen Russell's Committee.
(2) The "follow -up" on the returned exchange persons. Note letter to Negri.
(3) The "follow-up" on the "assembly of believers" of "This I Believe" done by Ward Wheelock, Ed Murrow, etc. Note one of series of letters to Ward.
(4) The fine work of "minority champions of America", Note work of Saunders Redding, Sammy Lee, Helen Matsunaga Shaw. Much on this to be written if desired!
(5) A thorough study of the Army Language School, its problems, accomplishments, possibilities. Note correspondence on the subject in files of the Secretary of the Army. Very important!

(6) Americans who have won respect, confidence and whose lives and work have held, as a wall, against false propaganda and blunders. Such as Bayard Dodge, Henry Houghton, S. M. Jordan, Sam Higginbottom, etc. What a story is to be told of the continuing influence in the tense and troubled East of Bayard Dodge! That is a story I would love to write!

(7) Careful orientation of teacher groups spending summers in foreign universities; (The plan worked out between San Jose State College and the University of Oslo, and of Long Beach College and Southeast Asia, and the work in this program of Superintendent Glen Goodwill. This is a very effective plan which will be given you, if you wish, in detail.

(8) A careful study and evaluation of the many institutions serving the cause of world understanding and cooperation. There are a great many. Do they overlap? What has been accomplished? Can their work be improved? This is a study which could well be made, mindful that they do have some relation to government support, -- and for other reasons! For example, the Institute of International Education, the World Affairs Councils, The Foreign Student Advisers, the Fulbright Scholarships Advisers, The Asia Foundation, the Rotary Club International Scholarships, etc. etc.

(9) The Seminars concerned with the study of American history, politics, etc., such as the one at Salzburg. What has come of them? How can they be improved? etc.

(10) Services rendered in the work of world understanding and assistance and cooperation by the various benevolent trusts, such as the Rockefeller, Carnegie, Ford, Commonwealth, etc. Had such a study been made, and properly publicized, the attack on the foundations by careless inquisitors would not have done the evil which has been done!

(11) Also, it looks now as if there would be a more intelligent consideration of various organizations intended to provide information on world affairs, into which, -- as is their custom -- the subversives have filered. We have "thrown out the baby with the bath water"!

(12) Recently the government has established at the various embassies what are called "Culture Attaches". What has come of this? Who has been chosen and how and why? What results? What can be done to add to the effectiveness of these officers. I am sure that Dr. Guy E. Snaveley, consultant for the United States Information Agency has some constructive ideas on this subject.

(13) Also the attaches concerned with science and scientists. How do we stand there. I hope you will seek out an opportunity to talk to Dr. Joseph Koepfli, who has been picking them, and who is, as you know, a professor at the California Institute of Technology.

(14) The past President of the National Association of Manufacturers, H. C. McClellan, is President of the Board of Trustees of Occidental College, and he is a man of vision, success in industry, and humanity. Is it not timely to make a study of all the various business, labor, educational, social, and miscellaneous organizations weaving the world? I am sure "Chad" McClellan, nowin South America is full of wisdom.

(15) That study which you made which came forth in "Partners in Progress" -- what has come of it. You write that the "International Financial Corporation" has been accepted, and that is good! But it is a document which should be brushed of any dust, and given wide circulation and study in the schools, and by the various organizations properly concerned, and circulated in foreign lands.

(16) This fine work which is being done in Italy, by Ing. Adriano Olivetti, (Movimenta Communita) See attached pamphlet! Also the cooperation of David Zellerbach, the translation of The Federalist, about to be unveiled in Rome, and the possibilities for similar cooperation in other university centers, is a story which I would love to elaborate for you! A rose for David!

(17) We are growing old in America! The average age is rising steadily. I saw the other day that we can presently expect to live to be one hundred! Well that is something. Now let us consider the great resource which is available for you in your work in the numbers of persons who have retired and made way for youth! Many of us -- for this is my category -- are well, full of experience, some wisdom, and great devotion to the adventures of truth seeking and imparting and the desire to serve our country and its institutions. Some of us are doddering. But some are not! What a rich resource there is here, for cultural attaches, special consultants, and all kinds of paid and unpaid appointments! Let Guy Snaveley, -- one of us! -- tell you about us! I have some ideas on this subject, believe me!

(18) We have a tremendous problem developing in this country due to the "baby pool", the increase of need of trained persons for the various professions, and the cost of education. We have it very forcibly indicated here in California. The Colleges State Supported, and the branches of the university of California cannot take any more students. I have been appointed on a commission to make a study of how it is and what to do. If ever we needed to assist young people of capacity to get on and get up it is now. And that is especially true of men and women in the various sciences. I can pour this on if you want me to do so!

(19) I wiwh you would talk with Ward Wheelock sometime. He is en route over the world. Please note his itinerary which I am enclosing. This broadcast "This I Believe", to which I have already referred, indicates something of his vision and drive. You have doubtless heard it, seen the book, and know of his plans for its extension. But he is one of a group of experts in the field of "advertising". It would be a very interesting conference if a lot of them could be assembled and to have them consider, the opinions held of us abroad and why and what to do.

(20) In various countries there are organizations developing on the lines of our World Affairs Councils in Cleveland and San Francisco. I would like very much to tell you especially about the "Gesellschaft fur Auslandskunde" in Germany and Frau Hildegarde Heilmann who is its energetic leader. Here is something which is to be studied and I think wisely promoted.

(21) I think we have come to a time when we can well wash up some of the soiled water spilled on great agencies working for world cooperation. For instance the curious attacks in Los Angeles on the United Nations and UNESCO. Your repute can help greatly here!

(22) Take a look at this tie-up between Stanford University and the University of Tokyo! Here is another pattern of relationship which can reap a harvest in time. Let Dr. Harold H. Fisher, director of the Hoover Institute and Library, who is just back from Tokyo, tell you how it is, what is planned, what is accomplished. Here is something which can be enlarged greatly do much good, let out much poison and cost the government nothing!

(22) Have you looked into the work of the American Field Service and perhaps talked to Stephen Gallotti, its driving power? Here is a way of building world understanding, friendship among young people, and directing lives for the common good, which has proved itself and has even greater possibilities. I have heard that the money is not coming in as needed. I know many of these young people who have lived in homes abroad and also young people who have come to live among us. When the plan receives careful consideration at every step, much good results.

(23) The organization by the great industrial corporations of an organization to assist privately supported colleges and universities to carry on their work, when so many other sources of assistance have dried up, is well worthy of your investigation, and I feel sure has had it. I believe that Wilson Compton is now its director. I think Messers Olds of US Steel and Abrams of Standard Oil of New Jersey have been its chief promoters. But our country through its entire history has received great power from the idealism, and services of these voluntary independent colleges, -- and this is something which I know precisely.

(24) I wish I might write you at considerable length on the subject of delinquency, especially juvenile, and its increase and what is being done and why. We have in this county, a typical corner of America! a commission headed by Zenas Potter which is about to make its report on the study, with recommendations. I am attaching a preliminary informal statement, which concerns this matter. Let me add this note; One of the causes of misbehavior is the misbehavior of those who are in "highplaces". I run across the track of such, constantly, in what I have been doing as a member of this committee. Strange how eminent persons, loyal, who would if necessary die for their country, fail to realize the effect of their careless behavior on young people and so called "little" people. What a story that is!

Well I could go on and on in this morning's meditation, but I will stop here. But before stopping say again what I feel strongly, and that is; You are doing a great work and because you are doing it, with intelligence, humility, and by reason of other talents, you counteract much of the effect of others who sit securely and seem to care little! And I know a multitude of people, similarly well furnished, who are in your category!

If you have an associate who would like to have me follow up in detail on any of this, I have time and inclination to do so.

In the meantime, best of good wishes for you and health and satisfaction in all that you are doing.

Sincerely

P02502

12. Adult Education!

Let us meditate this morning on the subject of so-called "Adult Education". For a long time there have been persons stirred up to see what could be done to prolong the process of thinking independently and to promote the work of the "maturation" -- What an ugly word! -- of persons!

Now I fully realize that you are off on the high seas somewhere in your private yacht and I am sure that you are doing a lot of pondering as you sail here, there and yon.

Also, in view of the fact that you did not mention my daily outpourings in your letter just received concerning my friend David Zellerbach, the chances are you have had no time to read them. Well, I carry the sneaking hope that they may have gone along with you and one of these days you will fish them out and take a look. No harm in hoping.

But whether you do or not, the main drive, as I am sure you know, is at me rather than at you.

Now I believe in the necessity and the possibility and some of the methods of "Adult Education". Through the processes of adult education whereby we add to the number who seek knowledge and pursue it, and who estimate facts and figures and philosophies with judgment based on wisdom, we can save this troubledland in which there are many adults who think to think is pink!

So let us take a look at what is going on.

Take me.

While President of Occidental College, stimulated by some wonderful people engaged in the process, -- and all of them out here then, I became the President of the California Association for Adult Education.

They were Lyman Bryson, Lucy Wilcox Adams, Irene Heineman, Tom Adam, Ethel Richardson Allen, George Mann, George Hedley, -- O many others.

The person who was really the sparkplug for this operation was Ethel Richardson Allen. I will come back to her presently.

The aim of this organization was not to "Americanize". Such adult education, also needed, was otherwise provided for.

It was not to do what was being done in the schools in the way of course offering, although it did work in this field and sought to stimulate in communities through the schools, this sort of adult education. In fact one of the directors was George Mann, who was the State Superintendent of Adult Education.

It was not intended to offer lectures and provide exhibits and stir up clubs, -- a work well done at the time by the various club organizations, especially the women's clubs, "Friday Morning", Ebell, etc. During those years these lubs were quite fearless in listening to persons who had something to say on controversial issues. They thought it good to do.

No, this California Association of Adult Education, privately sponsored, -- all kinds of people gave money, worked differently.

The Plan was to help any group, anywhere in the State to secure the means, leader, counsel, whatever they wanted to help them study and consider whatever they wanted to study and consider. Its plan was to start with the community where it wanted to start, and then help them on their way rejoicing!

Now at that time, there were two very special patrons. Interesting when you think about it. One was Dr. and Mrs. John R. Haynes, -- regarded as among the pioneer "liberals" of California and generous to the extreme. In fact they gave their all to estanlish the Haynes Foundation, of which Ethel Allen was one of the original counsellors and I was for many years a Trustee. It still does its work and its fund is in the millions.

The other was Allen and Mrs. Balch, quite on the intelligent "conservative side". He was head of the gas company. They had no children. They gave millions to Cal Tek, Pomona, Scirpps, Cornell, and some crumbs fell on the floor which I picked up for Occidental!

So for a number of years the California Association of Adult Education waxed and prospered.

There were classes from Marysville to San Diego.
There was established a school for workers.

Let me tell you about the school for workers.

The inspired directors said to one another, "organized labor is of increasing importance, to itself and to the community and to the industries with which it is interrelated."

"It is important that its leaders and its people shall be equipped with the disciplines of thought. It is also important that they shall have the appreciation of what labor is for. Man needs bread, but he lives not by bread alone."

So a school for workers was established. For a number of years it met in the buildings of Occidental College. They were loaned without cost.

Interested students were selected from the various colleges and universities to be members of the group, who -- foolish we! --- were to help these potential labor leaders as best they could. The faculty was composed of members of the faculties of the colleges who served without compensation. The leader of this group was Tom Adam, now full professor at New York University. You may know him. He and Ed worked together in a lot of educational enterprises.

The several labor organizations sent representatives.

We raised the money.

The school in its first years was a great success. It was so despite the fact that it redeived a measure of bombardment from both extremes. The LA Times, was afraid it was on the "subversive" side. The radicals thought that it was intended to make good little bourgeoise of the pupils.

Many of the students who came were very suspicious and on the guard.

But it was fun and a success and it did something which still has its effect for the open mind and the open road!

Later it moved to the campus of the Berkeley School of Religion and to the University of California. It carried on very well for a time, and that primarily due to the fine direction and the beautiful character of George Hedley of the faculty of Mills College. That is a story by itself.

But tension rose, hate filled the air, war spread its devastation, and the school ended.

Now this California Association of Adult Education received impetus and counsel and support from the American Association of Adult Education. Know about that?

Well that came into power, I think it came originally also, from the wise counsel and generous assistance of Fred F. Keppel, President of the Carnegie Corporation.

There was an adult if there ever was one!

He was the kind of man who backed good ideas, but in backing them he sought the person to lead, and then backed the person! A beautiful story that. Read sometime the life of Fred Keppel which was gitten out years ago by the Carnegie Corporation.

Well the man he backed for this work was a very intelligent, witty, humane, and able graduate of the University of California, by the name of Morse Cartwright! Let Tom tell you about him! I'll send a copy, by the way, of this letter to Tome. He will like it.

The American Association of Adult Education, well financed, well led, took headquarters at 60 West 42nd Street and began its operations. What a story that is. They published books on every conceivable subject within the province of adult education. They conducted conferences. They pulled in Lyman Bryson and helped him expand in accordance with his amazing talents. I'll send Lyman a copy of this letter. They drew in Tom Adam from Occidental, gathered up his ideas on "forum broadcasts", which he had worked out in Los Angeles, and which he had demonstrated in Boston, over WIXL. and presently Tom was on his way.

Only the war came along and Tom, being then a very loyal Britisher, went back and took the training at Sandhurst, and then was off the coast of Scotland and over Norway, as a Commando. Want that story? Its a beauty.

I have the history of this movement, and had all its publications which I gave to Occidental College. "This I Believe". That is what I am writing about, Ward. Faith without works is dead dead!

Back to dear Florence Nightingale. There was an adult, velieve me.

What did she say?

"REPORTS ARE NEVER SELF EXECUTIVE".

These workers in this vineyard, knew that, and they were moved by the adult method of getting on with the business of building an adult society.

How?

First get the facts.

Knowledge is hard, -- very hard.

But action without knowledge can be very harmful, especially when it is loaded with emotions, fear, propaganda and hate.

So knowledge must precede action, but it gets no place until it performs.

Got that.

Maybe I could give you abundant evidence of money spent in the millions for reports, that have gathered dust and have gotten no place. I am an authority on this subject.

Well a new group moved in on the Carnegie Corporation who did not know Joseph, or if they did were more concerned with the investments and what have you of the Corporation. There were problems. What they were, I do not know. But something went out of the Corporation. It lost, when Fred Keppel died, a -- what shall I call it? -- a quality of spirit. Yes, that is what I will call it.

The pool from which the Ammerican Association of Adult Education drank, began to go dry, and the offices were closed. Morse moved up to Columbia, and Tom joined him, and the work continued for a while. It may still be going on, but I am not sure.

But the fruit of the spirit. Let me see if I remember correctly. Yes, the fruit of the spirit, is love, joy, peace, kindness, goodness, meakness, self control! Against these there is no law!

Well, I can point out to you that from this Association there has come much fruit of the spirit.

Ask Lyman. Yes, pull in Lyman, he will tell you. Every Sunday he works at it, over "Invitation to Learning", and so much more. Thank you Lyman. I will send him a copy of this letter.

Then came fear.
Then came war.
Then came subversives.
Then came those who exploit fear and subversives for their own gain.
Then came all kinds of strange smearings.

Then came the very fear of the open mind and the open road.

"No, we cannot have him speak on that subject! That is controversial. As you know he is, well, he is a kind of pinké, if you know what I mean."

"No, I am not going to stick my neck out. I teach Political Science, and when the kids ask me what is communism. I tell them that they had better ask their parents, not me! No, not me. I have a family to support, and these kids can take home wierd interpretations of what you say."

And so on, and so on.

Keep still.
Conform.
Don't ask questions.
Sign anything, they ask you to sign.

To think is pink.

Then came along the Ford Foundation.

It got under way with great ideals.
Like any good endeavor it had its faults, in method, in persons, in program. But it had such lovely dollars.....

Among the institutions which it created and most generously fostered was and is "The Fund for Adult Education".

ThePresident of this Fund is C. Scott Fletcher.

It has now been in operation many years.

It gets out an annual report.

While the California Association had its pennies, and the American Association its dollars, the Fund for the Republic has had its hundreds of dollars, — really many millions.

Also the means of communication, of instruction, of getting at the mind and helping it to unloose itself from its prejudices, to learn the art of thinking, and to expand and mature, have been greatly added to. Radio, Record, Television, speed, s eed. You know how it is.

Here comes Ward! "This I Believe". Well that is one of them.

Now I try to keep in touch with what is going on through this well furnished agency.

They certainly are busy and they certainly have backed many fine endeavors.

I must see the last report. I'll ask Scott to send me one, so I can really give you some estimate of what they are doing.

One deed related to me.

You know about that.

I am very greatly interested in the idea, and the propgram as to the exchange of persons for general world understanding. Its a fineprogram, and the President of the Institute of International Education is a graduate of Occidental College, Kenneth Holland. You have tried to get him to make his statement, "This I Believe" but for some reason or other he hasn't done it.

We should always be ready, Kenneth, to give a reason for the faith that is in us. I'll send him a copy of this outpouring, which seems to have no end. But there will be an end.

Anyway I wanted to know how it was with all these thousands who had come to American, lived among us, and had gone back. Did they get what they came for? Did they return able to explain how it is here. Was the experience to their advantage. How is it with them now? Have they any ideas as to how we could serve them, — and our common cause! — better. Questions like that.

So I arranged with myself to go to Western Europe and try to find out. For I was eager to know, and I was a member of the Board of the World Affairs Council, — and besides it was a subject which had intrgued me for lo these many years.

Then a friend, gave me an automobile to use in Euppe.
And did other generous acts helping me on my way.
Then my friends the Larry Barrettos, — wise people, he having been a reporter on the war in Burmah, India and China, — went along.
Of course, also Helen. You don't know her. But you will.

Thanks to her I am alive, for in the latter years at the College I was in wretched health and she insisted on my resignation, and I came up here to sit permanently on the upper bleachers. But health has returned and I drop down once in a while to talk to the coach and pass a word with the team. I get a very good idea also, being able to see the whole field, who it is that slugs. But this is another matter....

Anyway, when Scott Fletcher heard that I was going to Europe, driven by this intemtion, he asked me to go also for him and to try to find out, especially, how we could do the work of adult education with reference to this exchange better and better.

We had very good talk.
He wrote a very useful letter of queries.
He gave me $2,000 to help on expenses. Very welcome gift indeed!
But most of all, as I wandered here and there, representing in some measure the fund for the Adult Education, (Ford Foundation sponsored) the doors opened wide wide, which would probably not have opened so wide or at all for that matter, if I had not had this prestige.

Now I made areport.
And I got happily entangled with many wonderful returned persons.
And I made friends, as Motjabi Minovi said "Which are written in my heart".
And I keep banging away at this typewriter, day after day,in correspondence with them.

It has become a vocation. Believe me it has become a reason for living.

And I am back home, and I am going back to follow up. for dear Ward, stimulater of the believers, REPORTS ARE NEVER SELF EXECUTIVE." That is the golden text. Ever hear of golden texts? I was brought up on them.

Story.

My brother and I were in our early years in a Sunday School Class in the Second Reformed Church of Schenectady. Our mother, whatever was wrong with us, gave us powdered rhubarb. What horrible stuff that is. Gosh how we hated it.

Now the golden text on a certain Sunday morning was "Wisdom is better than ~~riches~~". rubies

Howard Bird did not get the words very clearly.
The teacher asked, Howard what is the golden text?

Sais Howard; "Wisdom is better than Rhubarb!"

He did not know or care what wisdom was, but he knew whatever it was it was better than rhubarb. (By the way, this is a story which you could apply to the present tension filled, smear filled, situation.) Wisdom is better than a lot of other things besides rhubarb.

Coming back to Scott Fletcher, President of the Fund for Adult Education...

When I got back from Europe, I was chock full of ideas, opinions, and plans with reference to this wonderful force we have, which I had seen at work, first hand, in the exchange of persons. I had many answers to these questions. I wrote, hurriedly, a kind of report. It was multigraphed by the Fund. I sent it out with personal letters, to about 250 people. I gave it to the Institute of International Education, and it was boiled down and published in their Bulletin in 1952. And I followed up with a lot of people working in this field.

Added to my 1st were such people as Senator J. W. Fulbright, Justice Douglas, Senator Flanders, members of the various embassies, returned students now active in many fields of effectiveness, — etc. — lots of "big bonnets".

Then Kenneth Holland asked me to be a member of the Western Committee serving the constant stream of travelers, and in that office I have been concerned especially with what can be done in a typical community in seeing that the reception and care are what they should be.

The reception and care of the visitor in the community is the crux of tha matter.

But there are other cuxes. I won't go into that now, for what I am trying to meditate on in this letter is this matter of believers and their statements of faith and what they do or should do in applying the same to the Adult Mind.

I am forgetting Scott. Mustn't do that.

Here he is with a bag of gold, a very powerful driving spirit, and has the chance of a lifetime to help mature the mind, and believe me, it is my impression that the adult mind, in the USA needs to be kept open, with some kind of a lever, or it will close, for this is a day in which the trend is to keep quiet, — very quiet, or the goblins will get you if you don't watch out!

The goblins are even after the foundations which is most amazing.

Now I kept pouring out on Scott, as I pour out on you, my thoughts and emotions. I have much time. You are very busy and so is Scott. But I am very clever with a typewriter, and I have much time, and I know, O Ward, how well I know, that this is the day of all days for believers to stand up and be counted, for workers seeking to protect the adventurous mind, to keep adventuring, — for when it does not, then there is no adult education, there is merely adult crystallizing!

But Scott called a halt. And that was the end, I regret that.

But he had his reasons.

Now I bring this matter to a close. You get the drift. You know what concerns me. "Reports... no, I won't do that again!"

Now Ward, don't get the idea that I think, in all this I am so much! Don't think that I think I am the only one who has not bowed the knee to Baal. The point is simply this, that anyone of us, who has faith, and who puts his faith to work, in this critical time, wherever he can, with courage, and good will, can help in the process of being adult and helping others along the dusty road.

Every read the Bible?

Try sometime the first two chapters of a little letter that Paul wrote to the community of Colossae. "This is the secret that was hidden for ages but now it is clear!" Look up the rest of it.

A secret has been released in our time which can refresh the world, and in a twinkling destroy it.

No time to just fool around, is it?

Now I will close, but in closing let me give you a quotation for you to ponder as you wander in Mediterrenean waters....

You will see the author of it, if you will.

I will send a copy of this letter to Guglielmo Negri, Profrssor of Political Science at the University of Rome, and an adult, and an exchange students, working with a will and with faith and a merry, but concerned heart, for his counbby, -- his beautiful distressed and uncertain land....

But to come to the close.

Are you still there?

This quttation is to be found in the preface of a little pamphlet which tells the story in words and pictures of "The Italian Institute for Community Centers". It is a very inspiring little booklet.

It was sent to me by the dreamer, starry eyed deamer? Ah, Ah. By one of the most successful industrialist of Europe, who makes the best of machines and who loves his neighbor as himself. The chief backer of all movements in Italy for ADULT EDUCATION.

Here goes;

"The underlying idea of hhbb the new society is to create a common bond, both moral and material, between men whose lives are set within geographical boundaries, determined by nature and history".

The Community has pledged itself to strive to remove the sharp differences, even conflicts, which in existing conditions habitually develop, between agricultural, industrial and artisan peoples of a given area, where the social and economic life of Man is necessarily "splintered" and lacking in the element of solidarity.

"By the creation of a higher and at the same time realistic interest in the Community aims to settle such conflicts and to bring men together in brotherly friendship."

Its a New Social Experiment, Adriano Olivetti.

But not so new.

But it presses for realization with more insistence.

It takes in a larger geographical area than the Canavese, doesn't it.

Perhaps all of us.

Yes, I know you know, that it takes in all of us.

Now Ward, this letter closes....

Where do you come in? You tell me.

Do you remember, when I came back from Europe, more or less starry eyed myself, I saw you, for the first time sitting in Ed's office and you gathered me up, and we lunched, and you asked me to help pick believers, and you gave me some money for expenses. Some day I will tell you just how that money went.

Where do you fit in, and Scott Fletcher, and Negri, David, Morse, Tom, and all your stimulating ones.

You know.

I know.

And we cannot escape from what must be done.

We are part of the Communita Movimenta.

Affectionately

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Spewack,
930 Fifth Avenue
New York City, NY

Dear Bella and Sam:-

Affectionate greetings for you both! May this New Year be good to you in accordance with your deep desires.

We saw Mel several times in San Francisco and he told us there is a new show in the wind.

Last evening Peggy and Andy Anderson with their relations were with us for cocktails and music and good happy talk, in which yiu two geniuses were frequently in the conversation.

They hope very much that you will, one of these days, dig yourselves out of that tohu-bohu in which you live and take off some days in fair Hawaii.

As you must know, the Andersons are much beloved by their fellow citizens and Andy's songs, which come forth with melody and enchantment, have become the folk songs of the Islands.

Now there is a point in all this;

(1) One of these days Hawaii will be a State and the awareness of these jewels of the Pacific will be widespread.

(2) It is my humble opinion that a turn has come from cacaphony to order and beauty and melody, in architecture, in music, in sculpture, in painting and in life generally. Hope springs eternal so it seems!

(3) Andy's songs, done largely by Decca when Jack was alive and warm hearted, should be gone over and an album made of the same. Any ideas?

(4) If Bella and Sam Spewack could draw from their great resources a gay, laughter filled, dramatic script for a musical comedy of the sort with which their names are inspiringly connected, then all would be in readiness for the day when the islands stand on their own feet.

(5) Also as you know bewhiskered Horace Greeley said "Go West Young Man!" and the West is now mergeing with the Far East.

We may see you one of these days for we are planning to go back to Rome, if we can work it out in May.

With warm regards. O Yes, I gave Andy our copy of "Boy Meets Girl" for them to read in the islands. What a nice friendly sentiment was written in the front of it by you and you!

Helen joins in the best wishes,

My dear Helen:-

At a luncheon this morning, I was instructed by Billy Hudson, Fletcher and Larry, to add the following comments to the draft of letter which was prepared for your consideration and criticism and ultimately to be presented to the Board of Trustees of the National Trust.

The attached notes and queries remains as originally presented.

My colleagues thought that you should have the names of the proposed Board of Governors of the Monterey Club, to embody in any report which you might be making to the Trust: They are William Hudson, Frank Work, Herman Fletcher, Lloyd Tevis, John Gratiot, Allen Griffen, Paul Winslow, Harrison Godwin, Gerry Baldwin, and Remsen Bird.

They were of the opinion that the local committee of the National Trust should be responsible, as a committee and in conference with the Club officials, solely to the National Trust. It would be expected that it would have representatives on it from the Monterey Foundation and the Monterey History and Art Association, but those representatives would be chosen by the Trust and act as members of the committee of the Trust. They were of the opinion that this would give proper representation to the two organizations which have done so much for Monterey and at the same time would enable the two organizations -- the Trust and the Club -- to advise and work together without any confusion as to responsibilities.

It is certainly, as you of course are fully aware, the intention of those seeking to establish this Club, that everything done shall be with respect for the purposes of the bequest and in accordance with the judgment of the National Trust.

Such changes as might be made, in the course of time, obviously will take place after mutual consideration of the uses of the Club and the intention of the benefactor.

In all such procedure a local committee representing the Trust with representation as indicated, we fell sure, would assure the expedition of all matters mindful of the several interests involved.

Sincerely

PS Please note attached queries and notes.

Mr. A. Alan Post,
Legislative Auditor Room 306, State Capitol
Sacramento, Cal.

Dear Alan:-

Greetings and kindest of good wishes! May this year bring you all your heart's deep desires.

I have before me a copy of your letter of January 13 addressed to my friend, Alan G. Pattee. Interesting that you both should have the same first name and spelled in the same way.

I am very greatly interested in this restudy of Higher Education which will be completed in February and I hope I may have an opportunity to discuss it with you, -- son of my household!

The Supervisors appointed me a member of the tri county committee to see what can properly be done to meet the increasing need of provisioning higher education in Santa Cruz, San Benito and Monterey. I am the member from the Monterey Peninsula.

Since occupying this seat up here on the bleachers I have found much to do and am so grateful to those who helped in the restoration of my health.

Now cuddle up to Alan. In a recent conversation it was said to him, that he has a very special opportunity to make himself an expert in the State Legislature on all matters pertaining to education.

As you know the need of the experts right across the field is increasingly important, and besides education becomes more and more expensive.

Alan asked me to "feed" him all the information that I could, and this is one way.

Tell me more about yourself. I keep up a steady correspondence with many of the alumni body who are my friends and who are good enough to keep writing to me. It gives me a nice warm sensation!

I'd like to add you to the list.

President Arthur G. Coons,
Occidental College
Los Angeles, California

My dear Arthur:

Congratulations for this well merited honor and opportunity which has been given you! Elizabeth called from Greenwich yesterday and told us that you had been elected Vice President of the Association of American Colleges which means that you will be the President in the following year. How well you deserve this honor and how very glad I am that it has been given to you. One of many, and there will be many more.

I am going up to San Francisco on Thursday for some good talk with David Zellerbach concerning this unveiling of the Italian translation of The Federalist for which he is responsible.

You should know David for he is one of the leaders in San Francisco in benefaction and services far beyond the line of duty.

I hope some day I can cite him for honors which he, also, richly deserves.

I am enclosing some copies of letters.

My pile on the top of your desk must be enormous, by now. Your very kind and considerate Miss Paule, tells me she has put them on the top. Thank you dear Miss Paule.

Please note the correspondence with Allen Pattee concerning this study of higher education in California. Here in Alan Post is another marching son of our household. Very interesting to find them everywhere more or less at the top.

Story.

Friend; Captain Dollar, you are just back from London. What do you think of the English.

Captain Dollar; Why I am sorry I did not meet any. I only had time for the heads of departments, and as you know they are all from Scotland!

Why is it do you suppose that we find these Occidental graduates far beyond the law of averages, or whatever is the yardstick you use, as "heads of the departments". I know.

Mr. Woodrow Wersig, Editor
Woman's Home Companion

Dear Woodrow:-

The New Year is on its way and looks a bit more shining than some of its recent predecessors! May it be a very good one for you and yours and bring to you whatever you want.

As you know I keep you in my heart and think of your character, vision, drive and competence and the instruments you have for the better devising of the world!

You know how it is with me. Something inside drives with mighty force and I have been able to prove now very clearly to myself that this weaving of persons of good will and understanding is a most potent element in getting the bitterness out of the cauldron!

As illustration, I am attaching another package of letters which I wish you would take home and read when you get a moment in that fair city of Princeton!

I am a bit worried about Gabrielle's story of Sighartstein in that she has done it in German and sent it to New York for Mrs. Westphal to put in smooth English. An essential element of Gabrielle's sensitive writing is her special kind of English, which is a sheer delight.

Please note these letters which I am writing to Ward Wheelock. There are twelve of them and they will probably go on into the hundreds from the way they flood forth.

"This I Believe" in broadcast, record, and book is his creation, and it helps, but I feel sure that more can come of what he has done by the kind of consideration indicated in these letters.

Please note especially the one about Sammy Lee, Helen Matsunaga Shaw, and Saunders Redding! That would be a very good story for your own fine publication.

Do you ever see anything of Jay Hopkins? Hunt him up sometime. I am enclosing one of his very important addresses. He is way out in front in the application of atomic power to industrial uses.

He built also the Nautilus ----------!!!!!!!!!!

Have a good year and don't work too hard.

Mr. Joseph Scott,
First and Broadway, 1151
Los Angeles, California

Dear Joe:-

You are powerful good for me!

Thank you for your letter concerning the film of St. Francis, which will be made, at the proper time. We are very patient about that.

Also for the clipping which you have excerpted from the LA Times with its comment on you by Bill Henry.

You cannot be 87. Something is wrong.

Well maybe you are, but youth is not in years, it is in the open mind and the open road, the willingnness to sit and listen, and to speak out when it is appropriate, and it is in the inner stirrings which take place because of the spirit, -- the Spirit in which we move and have our Being.

We find ourselves in its control in various ways, and it is very evident that you have done just that.

I am so sorry that Mr. Breen has not been very well. We must look into that.

I wish this man Menotti, who seems to be so able and so really great a creator could get entahgled with this idea of the picture of this beloved one.

There are persons who appear from time to time who seem to take the bitterness out of the waters.

One of them to-day is certainly Dr. Albert Schweitzer, who approaches you in years and stands along side in humility, patience and faith.

So it is.

Take good care of the year and let the year take good care of you.

Dr. Guy E. Snavely Consultant,

Dear Guy:-

Thank you very much for yout thoughtful letter concerning Superintendent Glen T. Goodwill of Monterey. As soon as your letter arrived I called his house and discovered Mrs. Mrs. Goodwill that he was in Washington.

She got in touch with him by telephone and I imagine that he will probably see you on Monday and you and he will work out something which will be appropriate to his interests and capacities. I hope so anyway.

Are you picking all the culture attaches? I hope so. Could not be a better.

I am a kind of unofficial one of those myself and find ways and means of assisting at least.

Before Frank Snowden was appointed the idea of going to Rome, with the connections which I enjoy there, seemed like a good idea and I would have gone.

I am completely at home in German and get along fairly well in Italian and stumble along in French, but I could put anyone of them in good order if I put my mind to it.

I have sometimes thought I would like to be a culture attache in Austria, because as you know I had this very good time in weaving into the fabric of that country in 1952.

It sounds as if I were seeking something, but I am not, but the idea is somewhat alluring at that. Fulton Freeman's endorsement when he thought there was this vacancy in Rome I am enclosing, in case you have some thoughts on the subject. What's the matter with me anyway. I am so happy here, comfortable, finding lots for idle hands to do, and living already in God&s special paradise. But I have this "vocation" that upsets one's satisfaction with comfort.

Take good care of Glen Goodwill. He is able, experienced and could do a very fine job, if asked.

This letter to Nelson Rockefeller, will interest you.

My dear Ward:-

Last evening the Winslows and the Robert Andersons of Hawaii were with us for cocktails and good talk, and your name was among those mentioned with friendliness and much conversation on many matters in which we are all interested!

Andy said that he had seen you some time in the not too distant past.

I gave him a copy of "This I Believe" and told him something of the weaving that has gone on between you and me. Also I gave him a copy of "Boy Meets Girl" for I hope that Andy and Bella and Sam Spewack will work out something together one of these days.

You are, by the itinerary off for two years or so and probably are not allowing yourself to get enmeshed in any new endeavors, but put in your mind someplace the thought, that we must see that these fine songs of this melodious persons get the best consideration for this world of increasing believers.

I gave Andy the copy of your itinerary which you sent me and I hereby ask Mrs. Colgan to send me another, so I can keep watch over you.

I am going up on Thursday to be with David Zellerbach and to talk with Filipo Muzi-Falconi, the Italian Consul, about the "unveiling" of the Italian translation of the Federalist, which will be done in late September.

What you are doing with your yacht, -- with the masts down, from Le Havre to Marseilles is just what Sam and Maurine Morse did two years ago with theirs. Sam made a book of his log, with illustrations which you would enjoy seeing. I'll send it to you if you want to see it, and go and do likewise.

I am sending a copy of my letters written to you on the application of belief to the problems of the day, to N elson Rockefeller. There is a man who is now in a very important positionto help bring reports to execution.

I hope you and your Clay have a wonderful time. I wish we could be with you, especially in Aegean and Adriatic waters. During the first world war, I was on the island of Corfou.

I am deeply grateful to you for sending me a copy of your very timely letter to Helen Douglas.

Needless to say, I agree with every word of it, and I feel that now more and more people are beginning to have the same concern about the ambitions of the man about whom you wrote. I find it almost impossible to understand why President Eisenhower should have picked him as a running mate, but I think this must have been due to the President's political inexperience at that point.

I appreciate more than I can tell you the kind references that you made to Dad and me in your letter.

Dear Sam:-

Your note asking me what I am doing these days, has just come to han d. Helen and I have been in San Francisco celebrating her birthday and attending some meetings and find your card on our return. You stimulate me to a negthy statement, which I hope you will have time to read!

lengthy

One of these days I want to write for the Lafayette Alumnus an article on "How to sit effectively on a shelf!" Or what to do when you make room for youth!

I am having, really, the most satisfying chapter of my life! Every morning, almost, now I get up with the chickens and spend two hours -- sometimes more -- at this typewriter and I correspond with friends in whom I rejoice, or with persons who are doing the work of the world, -- in almost every country into which my letters can go!

This I do especially with the alumni of Occidental College, who are now, in positions of responsibility testing and applying the ideals and instruction of the College. They include management of great corporations, leading educators, artists and poets, diplomats, broadcasters, writers, scientists, politicians, -- in fact every calling you can think of -- lots of ministers, lots of persons in important social agencies, and friends and classmates like you, Bill Ross, and others who become to me more precious as the number dwindles and the days of our student life become even more vivid!

What do I do?

(1) I am on the 6th Army Advisory Committee and especially concerned with the Army Language School. Very important that!

(2) I am on the Board of the recently organized Robert Louis Stevenson School for Boys at Pebble Beach.

(3) The Board of Trustees of the World Affairs Council of Northern California, and the Executive Committee of the Monterey Branch.

(4) The Coast Committee on the care and reception of Foreign Students and Scholars of the Institute of International Education.

(5) The Board of Trustees of the Carmel Foundation for the care of the aged. Important that, believe me.

(6) Supervisor Jacobson of Monterey County appointed me recently vice chairman of the Steering Committee of the County to concern itself with the problems, the cause and possible cure, of crime, and especially juvenile delinquency in this beautiful area of our Republic! We have much. Much needs to be done.

(7) My friend, Prof. Guglielmo Negri, Professor of Political Science at the University of Rome, a returned student from Harvard, is giving courses in American History, — especially the US Critical Period from the end of the Revolution through the adoption of the Constit tion. David Zellerbach gave me some money to give him for the translation of The Federalist. This effort of Negri to build an informed, trained "Middle Class", in this country, from which the waters of true culture have fertilized the world, — and in this time when what happens in Italy is so important to all freedom loving peoples — is something which keeps me imaginative, and with which I intend to work, — from here out!

(8) Just sitting here I enjoy the coming of young people who honor me seeking advice for their further education.

Maybe this sounds immodest or boasting or the reassurance of the aging! But it is not that! What I am driving at, is that anyone of us, alive when the world totters, who has faith, hope, experience, — and who has made way for the younger, can fill his life to the very full with all kinds of ways and means of helping with the show!

If you retire and suck your thumb, you go down very fast into unconscious deterioration and innocuous desuetude! If you just putter in the garden or work at a hobby, it helps, — but not enough. But if you take hold, any place, if you keep your association with the younger, if you use your faith in whatever work comes to hand, — then for you Old Ben Ezra had the right idea!

But why tell you. You are a prime illustration!

Grafin Gabrielle Palffy,
Schloss Sighartstein,
Neumarkt-bei-Salzburg
Austria

Dear Gabrielle:-

Helen and I are just returned from a little visit to San Francisco where we have been attending some meetings and celebrating her birthday. Your very welcome letter was here on our return and we have read it, held by wamm and vivid memories! -- all four of us -- to the Barrettos.

There is much to write about and to catch up for quite a few days have passed since the last exchange of letters. You have been very busy and I have restrained myself knowing that it was so, and wanting not to add to your burdens!

Now firstly! As to the visitation of the group with Jean Wolfram. You put your finger precisely on a problem and a need! I am so strongly convinced that a lot of this jaunting about ends in jaunting about, gripping, rushing here there and yon, and does not get done what is intended.

When care is exercised in selection. When care is exercised in preparation for the experience. When care is exercised in preparing the people in the several communities to which these seekers come. When care is exercised in not planning to cover the whole world in one pele mele swoop, -- then something happens that is good, constructive and carries on.

What you wrote is practically the same story as came from Hildegarde Heilmann in Munich.

We spend now about nine million lovely dollars a year as a nation to promote this exchange. All kinds of institutions colleges, American Field Service, Foundations, Departments of Government, Clubs, and generous patrons, pour gold into this weaving of peoples. And I thouroughly believe in it. But I am constantly made aware of the distressing limitation which out of your experience you emphasize. So many wander also over the world "lonely as a cloud".

While in San Francisco I had several visits with Kenneth Holland, President of the Institute of International Education, and it is through his office that much of this coming and going functions. He knows the problem. For him it is also a problem of getting the right people to serve the cause and getting the necessary dollars for the community offices to care for these travelers.

But there are a lot of people I know, literally in almost every country available for correspondence, who are like you, more than ready to do what you can to build information, mesh the persons of good will, and establish effective means of cooperation, -- and who will do this for no expense at all!

What I wish very much we could work out is places like Sighartstein, to which these travelers could come, and stay a while, and let the roots of friendship and faith, go down and then we would have the real fruit coming from such nourishment!

For example!

One of the areas of real significance in this country is its true "culture". We are well known for our accomplishments in the fields of manufacture, "know-how", tall buildings, mass production, and wide spread prosperity. We are frightening and reassuring by the presence of our soldiers all over Western Europe. All kinds of ideas about us, favorable and unfavorable, are afloat over the world.

But that there is a true, rich, real individual dignity and American authentic culture, -- is not so well known.

That it may be known, and that there may be a proper appreciation of the culture of other peoples, we now have what is called "Culture Attaches" in most of the embassies of the world. I know many. Some are very able. Some are not so able.

One of the great problems of this land is that there is not an adequate educational program nor the fundamental consecration, for the production of the ~~needs~~ persons to serve in the various fields of enterprise beyond our borders. Its very difficult to get first class, trained, consecrated people to serve in other lands. There are many reasons which I do not need to develop here, but it is true.

Now this exchange program, these traveling groups, like the one exhibited to you, and also the appearance of American artists in other lands, offer just what is needed to reveal -- the one to the other! -- that throughout the world there are wise, kind, able, worthy people who seek -- in this time so fraught with peril, so full of opportunity -- to save and serve the Blessed Society of which many have dreamed and for which many have nobly died!

You and I are items in this great opportunity. We have faith, unconquerable good will, and we, in our places, can do much effective in what we do and in illustration for others, for we are not unique. We just are awake!

For example.

My friends, Roland Hayes, Zlatko Balocowic, and Eloise Polk are to appear in concert in most of the countries of Western Europe. One is a singer, one a violinist and one a pianist. They are worthy, able and understanding.

In every city in which they are to appear the way should be made smooth. The friends of man and God should be informed! The returned students and scholars, the American students and scholars, the embassies, the culture attaches, dear understanding people, like you, and all else that can be marshalled for the inspiration, power of the occasion should be effectively marshalled.

It should be a matter of prime concern of the Culture Attaches, and I should think not a very difficult job to do.

At any rate, I am getting from the three of them their programs and schedules and I intend -- so help me! -- to illustrate how we can through just these three people, present, the United States, -- not shoving, not imperialistic, not just full of sound and bombast -- we have that too! -- but the United States, of talent, sound and significant culture!

Roland is, as you know, a negro. Zlatko is a born Croat but a lover of freedom and married to a friend of almost her entire life. Eloise is 22, charming, very talented and fully comprehending the importance of what I am writing.

Also I have before me a letter from Bing Crosby, who is going in the other direction! He will be in Southeast Asia, and there is no one in the picture field, whose influence has been so constantly on the "Hollywood" group. I am to be with him this next week, for some good talk on the subject.

I am attaching some letters which will show you what goes on in my mind. The one to Sam Mills is to the permanent secretary of my college class.

Also I am sending you a copy of Adlai Stevenson's book, "The Call to Greatness". It helps!

Love from us both. God bless you and your family and take good care of Katrein and Martin!

Please! Please! do not feel ever the necessity of answering all my letters in praise of you! This one which I have just received much appreciated, distresses me, for I know that your time must be devoted to the exceedingly important work which you are doing in this touch-and-go time! We hang by our little fingers on the edge of an abyss, when, if we could turn around, or would turn around, we could see, there behind us, the vista of ever increasing opportunities for the saving and serving of the Good Society. And you are, way up there, on a pinnacle, calling attention to this other view!

But I have learned in this wonderful chapter of my so-called "retirement", the technics of the use of my free time. I sit on the upper bleachers and I cheer the team, and I call down to the quarterback, and occasionally step down to discuss matters with the coach!

In other words, free from similes, I carry on a correspondence now, with hundreds of persons whose names are written in my heart, and especially with the alumni of Occidental who now, all over the world, are applying, in various fields of enterprise, the ideas and instruction to which they were exposed in the days of their presence on the college campus.

I like sending occasionally copies of this correspondence to you, and certainly enjoy tremendously, having you on my list, but don't add to your problems the burden of answering. You answer me well enough over the air! That last broadcast on the schools and the need of teachers, and the respect for real learning, and the adventure of free minds, was one most inspiring answer.

I am just back from San Francisco where I had several good talks with Kenneth Holland -- alumnus of the college! -- on the whole matter of the exchange of persons, and the need of training for the various new and demanding responsibilities of leaders and experts, over the whole world. If we are going to save and serve The Republic, we hav e,got to have something like consecrated trained wise and informed "missionaries", for the jobs which must be filled almost everywhere -- or else.... Ken will tell you of the conversation. Here is something I can certainly work at!

I'll keep writing to you, but have your secretary pass on only what seems important to her!

Best to you and Janet, always from both

God bless you!

Mr. Zenas Potter, Chairman
Steering Committee on Delinquency
PO Box, Carmel, Cal.

Dear Zenas:-

Thank you for your fine letter in defense of procedure and in answer to my statement concerning our readiness for action! That sort of exchange, as we both agreed, was a good idea!

Also the conversation we had yesterday over the telephone concerning the Ramirez Family and the number in it who were delinquents and repeaters, is something which I wish we had done with a tape recording. Perhaps you will pull it together for some kind of a document which we can use.

I am enclosing a letter from Hallock Hoffman in which he sums up the purposes of The Fund for the Republic and comments with reference to his personal interest in the problems of "The wetbacks".

I have just received from him a book, entitled "Diary of a Self-made Convict", Henry Regnery Co., 1954, by Alfred Hassler, a Conscientious Objector. In it is a paragraph on the subject of crime from some writing of John Ruskin. (Strange source for he could have stood a bit of heart softening himself!)

"Crime cannot be hindered by punishment; it will always find some shape and outlet, unpunishable or unclosed. Crime cannot be truly hindered by letting man grow up a criminal — by taking away the will to commit sin; nor by mere punishment of its commission. Crime small and great, cannot truly be stayed by education of the intellect only; which is on some men wasted and for others mischievous; but education of the heart which is alike good and necessary for all."

The attached article from the New York Times, September 13, on the subject of parental responsibility is somethingto give consideration.

You will agree that the environment, physical and mental, which surrounds so many who go wrong has so much to do with misbehavior. When hate is the "principality of the air", when homes are filled with wrangling or both parents employed and children return from school to nothingness, or when children are born, as with the Ramires family, into homes of criminal repeaters, or when men in high places by their behavior make cynics of the young, or when race prejudice creates frustration and fear, or when the prisons are "bull pens" for tutoring in crime, — there is — in one or all — the cause of delinquency, which spreads its corruption through this Republic.

I'll see you to-morrow and am sorry to have missed the last meeting.

Mr. Roger Mastrudo
The Foreign Policy Association
421 Powell Street,
San Francisco, California

My dear Mr? Mastrudo:-

Enclosed is a self explanatory letter from Dr. George G. Fox and a copy of my answer to him.

I am of course more than delighted to work with you in making the best use of Dr. Fox's time and giving him every opportunity that can be given to know the West, say his piece and help in this pressing cause of better world understanding and cooperation, and especially with Italy.

I will be up again presently and will plan and plot with you.

As it stands now, the following;

(1) He will give the Remsen Bird lectures at Occidental College, during the week ofthe 17-24 of April. All engagements in the region of Occidental prior to that week and during that week are in the care of Dr. Coons.

(2) Prior to that time, arrangements are being made for him to be at the Lewis and Clark College in Portland. President Morgan Odell is in correspondence with him for that time.

(3) Helen Russell and David Zellerbach and Baron Filippo Munzi-Falconi should be consulted as to the appearances in San Francisco. They all want to do what they can.

(4) President Lynn White of Mills College plans to have him at Mills.

(5) He will be invited to speak when it is convenient for him at Carmel under the auspices of the World Affairs Council, Monterey branch.

(6) I have written to Norton Clapp, Exchange Bldg., Seattle, benevolen t trustee of the College of Puget Sound to concern himself with this program for Washington, which he will do. I want him, especially to see that Dr. Fox gets about in the world of Weyerhaueser Timber Co., ofwhich Norton Clapp is a Director.

(7) I am personally very much interested in a project in Rome in connection with the University of Rome, and the studies now given there in American History, for which David Zellerbach provided some money.

I went up to SF this week for a meeting of the board of the World Affairs Council, a visit with Helen Russell and Harriet Eliel, with reference to the problems of financing of the local committee on hospitality, etc. for the Institute of International Education and for some conversations with President Kenneth Holland.

I want very much to talk out the whole subject of the exchange of persons, -- problems and possibilities -- with you, and to air some ideas which you may be good enough to scrutinize.

One thing is the very great need, -- in matters which must concern the Foreign Policy Association -- of the training of persons for all kinds of services for the country in foreign lands.

We are in increasing need of trained persons in government, in business, in the professions, in the various voluntary services, in the work of the benevolent boards, in education, etc. the world around, -- one place especially in Africa! and it is very evident to me, and must be even more to you and Mr. Morley, that such training and the need of it, are not matters of efficient planning on the part of the institutions which should be concerned with the same.

Take for instance, this Army Language School, -- Here is something going on which has very great significance for the College world. It needs to be understood, evaluated, opinions formed, constructive criticism given, and what is espedially important for the College world known in the College world.

Arthur Coons, President of Occidental College is coming up this week for an inspection and I sincerely hope one of the results will be the visitation to the school of the executive committee of the Western College Association. I will keep you informed.

There are 500 teachers teaching 20 languages to 2,000 Army personnel. The graduates annually are about 1,000. They go forth in many fields. What happens to them? How effective is the training? What sifts back into civilian life? What continues to serve the nation? Does the instruction stick? etc.

So there is much to talk about. I am delighted that you are going to busy yourself for Dr. Fox. You take over and what I do henceforth will be in consultation with you!

Dr. George G. Fox,
Hancock Point, Maine

Dear George;-

Thank you for your letter just received. And thank you God for not doing any damage in Hancock Point to the residence and other possessions of the Foxes! Isn't it odd that there are those who really believe that such a visitation is the work of a divine being, for some reason good enough for him? Very odd!

I am glad that the Foreign Policy Association has been stirred up and is so ready and I am sure most competent to perform. I have written to Roger Mastrudo as enclosed.

B fore me is a very lengthy document entitled, "Annual Program Proposal", -- American Commission for Cultural Exchange with Italy, (P.L.584, 79th Congress, The Fulbright Act), and on it the USIA office has penned this bit "See page 21 for project on Center of American Studies".

I shall make a careful exploration of this document and will be writing you presently about it.

Helen Russell, with whom we have been this last week, leaves to-morrow for Venice, and Jugo Slavia, and will have a yacht of some kind which she will take down the Illyrian Coast. The Cabot Browns are going with her. She will be back in November. Her address will be care of Morgan and Co., Paris. But you may have gotten to her already. If not she will stop by the office of the Institute of International Education, on her way through New York.

I wish very much that you could see the family Balocowic in Camden. Zlatko will be leaving in March for an extended world wide concert tour and he and Joycie are dear life long friends. They have great zeal, great devotion, and can greatly help the cause.

I am working up a little project for myself and that is demonstrating what can be done in the development of a proper appreciation of our common cultural interests by preparing the ground in various communities for three of my friends who are giving concerts abroad, and in many lands. They are Roland Hayes, Eloise Polk and Zlatko Balocowic. These people and what they do and who they are and how they perform should certainly be something that should greatly concern the Cultural Attachos we have sprinkled over the globe. Yes?

The enclosed letters will interest you. Best to Mrs. Fox.

Eagle Rock, Los Angeles, Cal.

Dear George:-

Helen and I are just returned from San Francisco, where we were busy in many matters and also very happily celebrating her birthday! The enclosed package of letters will entertain you, I feel sure, and you will have some helpful ideas.

Ken tells me that there has been an overhauling of the Committee of Los Angeles and Jason Joy has taken over the direction. Make a point of knowing him. I have been on the edge of his life for many years and he was heralded in Hollywood, and expecially at Twentieth Century Fox, as the great intellectual! He is a nice person. How deep his interest is in this exchange business and how well qualified he is for the job, I would like very much to know. The very word "international" is a fight word in LA, as you very well know, and it is most important that those who seek to produce wise and humane and informed people the world around, who are woven together in the proper kind of a fabric is important everywhere, but certainly most importan t where you live!

That the committee has been jammed by a lot of personality problems is something that is very sad indeed. I wish that they had chosen long ago someone who had what it takes!

Well no use crying over the milk that is spilled.

I had a nice note from Paul Webb. There are problems. Apparently Principal Foley has already been considered and he thought he had it sewed up and Paul would not, of course, want to compete with his friend. Well we shall see what Tony finds out when he gets back to Rome.

No, I don't thinkwe can go with the Family Baplocowic, as much as we would like to do it, but we can help by letters and in various other ways. When I get a chance I want to write you at considerable length on the matter of the encouragement of the talented in world appearance and what can be done to help.

I have three on my list who are personal friends who go abroad at this time, Roland Hayes, Zlatko Balocowic, and Eloise Polk. Watch what happens about them!

Adele Buckner, General Buckner's widow, asked us the other day if we knew of any group going to Europe -- such as the kind you used to take. We don't. Do you?

More later.

President Ralph Cooper Hutchison
Lafayette College, Easton, Pa

Dear Hutch:-

Greetings and best wishes for a very successful college year for Lafayette, and for all who love learning and human being, and would be wise and kind!

An idea occurred to me the other day when talking with my friend, Tim Durant. Tim is a friend of John Huston who did the picture "The Red Badge of Courage", and he played in the said picture a leading part. He was also recently married at the Ireland home of the Hustons.

I know that the Stephen Crane collection at Lafayette must be high in your interest and that it must be a quickening affair for the college on the side of "Culture".

Cute story about Culture;;;

Years ago we had a great big mighty football full back from Georgia named "Bud" Collier. He had come out to go to USC and for some reason could not take it and came over to Occidental and more or less fell in love with the place.

He became a great hero on the campus, and his mighty heaves of the ball and his stentorian voice and his other qualities were much appreciated.

But after a very successful season he returned from town emotionally and spiritually stirred up and like some old Greek, divested himself of his raiment and danced on the green in front of one of the sorority houses!

Dean Cleland called him in and suggested gently that he leave the college for a semester and think it over, -- which he did.

On his return he visited the Dean and in substance this is what he said;

"Dean Cleland, I have learned my lesson! When I was here before my suspension, I was just one other young man on the make. It was money that I wanted and I was sure that the college educationwould help me to make money. Now I am back with a much better understanding and I know what the college will do for me. It will give me culture. It is culture that I want, and I know when I get culture the money will flow in!"

But coming back to the "Red Badge of Courage". If you have not done so, why don't youwrite to Dore Schary, President of MGM, and see if you cannot get a copy of that fine film for the college archives. You probably have done this, but if you haven't it should add to the importance and stimulus of this Society of Stephen Craneana! Yes?

I keep aware and concerned about a lot of things and sometimes try to run in all directions at once! The times are so fraught with peril and possibilities for the Good Society here, there and yon! I have time, and wonder, and zeal and some experience, and I try to draw all that I have together to help the Great Cause.

What particularly concerns me is the whole matter of the weaving of leaders and experts, students and scholars through the exchange program, — and when this is well done it certainly is fruitful. But it needs scrutiny, care, and follow-up from the time of choosing to the time of returning!

Arthur Coons is coming up here next week to meet with the faculty and officers of the Army Language School. That is something that should engage the attention of all who seek to prepare the youth for the world into which they will -- we hope -- enter and save and serve!

I hope that he will give an address sometime before the Association of American Colleges on the subject, for believe me, is going to see something that will startle him!

I am on the Citizens Advisory Committee of the 6th Army and this school is my special field of interest.

So much for now! Best to your charming lady.

I am so glad that you have stirred up the college to honor this creative genius, and I hope that chapter of Delta Upsilon of which he was a member has such an intellectual and cultural interest. It would do them good toooooo, — I imagine!

Mr. Web Jones, Editor
Western Family
1300 North Wilton Place,
Los Angeles, 28, Cal

My dear Mr. Jones:-

Thank you very much for your nice warm letter and for the copy of the "face lifted" "Western Family! It bears very obviously Merle's fine touch and I am sure will add much not only to the grace of the magazine but to its acceptability here, there and yon! And may you prosper accordingly.

But I would like to "stick to my last" and continue to explore the use of your magazine for a cause which is very dear to my heart and concerning which I am sure I can, through you, and it, and Merle make a contribution.

This is a very "touch and go" time and the world may toss in a cauldron of trouble and the same blow up in out face or, with some thought, wisdom, faith, courage, and planning we may be able to establish over the world the lovely Good Society of which the Utopians have dreamed and for which occasionally someone dares to die!

Now I take a Gallup Poll.

The interests of the Western Family are not centered in bread, fun, know-how, do it yourself, raiment, refreshments, Cleansing powders, ALONE!

They are interested also in how to get on and get up and have a better life for themselves and their children and their children's children.

There never was a time in all time when so much is being said and written and done, concerning the work of education. What to do about it? Where to go to school? How to pay the bills? How to get the best training for this or that profession? What shall we do with Bill who is determined to be a scientist and we have so little money? How shall one get training for government service and where? What about this exchange business? Cpuld I be eligible for it? Would you prefer the small college or the great university, and what are the virtues of both? etc. etc.

I get asked questions like that constantly and -- forgive the immodesty -- no it is not immodesty -- if after a life on a campus I couldn't answer them, I would be a sad sack indeed.

Now what I would like very much to do, in some magazine, and I sound you out first, is conduct a column on "Education". I would like to do it very much down to earth, and I would like to open myself to questions on the subject and to answer them directly and through the pages of said magazine.

Why me?

(1) All my life practically in educational institutions, and my forefathers before me.

(2) President of Occidental College for 25 years, on its Board and still as retired deeply interested and active in its affairs.

(3) One of the organizers and past presidents of the Western College Association, in which are all the colleges and universities of the West.

(4) Member for many years and President of the Association of American Colleges, which takes in all reputable instititions of higher learning.

(5) Member of the Board during the past thirty years of a half dozen private schools, and at present on the list of advisors for a great many such instititions, also one of the 6rganizers of the Robert Louis Stevenson School for Boys at Pebble Beach.

(6) Consultant in the organization of the community supported Monterey Peninsula College.

(7) Consultant for some time on audio visual education of Decca Records, and other organizations.

(8) Member of several boards, including the LA Symphony, concerned with art, music, and music education.

nnh. As I look at myself I think I am well qualified to do this job, and knowing so many who are bewildered as to what to do, where to go, how to get money etc. I would like to be answering these questions which concern so many, through the pages of some magazine.

Also I am on the SF Committee of the Institute of International Education and I have made a world wide study ofthis very important interest -- the exchange of students, scholars, experts and leaders, -- and believe me this is important. as a government we put nine millions in it in 1954-55!

O Yes, to pour on some more....

I am a member of the Citizens ~~[illegible]~~ Advisory Committee of the 6th Army, and especially concerned with the functioning of the Army Language School. Many yuung people write me for information concerning the Army plan for the training in language. Very important. Very great opportunity. "I am about to take my turn in the Army? I am very much interested in the Army Language School? I plan when I get through my training to go to College and then I wan t to get into the State Department and be ready and competent for assignment to Southeast Asia. How would you suggest I go about it?"

Want an answer.

"My daughter is a bright girl, but she simplycannot learn to read. Are there institutions in the USA where they specialize in training such a girl, that she may be released from this inhibition?" Yes there are. This is what you should do, etc.

"I am a Korean American and I want to train myself for public health and go back to Korean and serve the land of my fathers as a physician and one especially trained in public health? Where will I go? Are there funds to help me? What do you suggest?" Can I help such a person? Why, of course, and hav e!

"I am a pianist. I want to make the playing of the piano my life career. I want in addition to training in the field of my special interest, also a broader culture, for I think that is important? Where shall I go? Are there committees where I can be given an audition, in Los Angeles? Are there schools where there are scholarships?"

Easy questions for me, but often tormenting for the young and eager and uninformed.

We have come to a time in this country when there is little place for the untutored, the day laborer, ~~the pbbbbbbbb~~ those who are not precisely trained for some field of useful and profitable endeavor. That it is so is the concern of almost every young person in this country and the elders who want and should help them.

I wish very much you would explore what I have written and if it interests you, good! If not I intend to take it up — Merle note! — with Paul Smith and Woodrow Wersig at the Colliers-Crowell menage.

Enough for now. But you must, I am sure, get the beat of my heart, — and imagination!

PO2502 Carmel, Sept 18

President Robert Blum, Committee for Free Asia,
105 Market Street
San Francisco, Cal.

My dear Bob:-

These various documents telling the story of the Committee for Free Asia are spread about me this morning. As I wrote you I want to make, concerning them, such observations as come to my mind. I shall probably tell you nothing you do not know and add but little, but it gives me a good way to study them with the intention of sending you, as you kindly asked, this report. So.

(1) Background Information.

It is obvious that the program, practical methods of doing what is intended prestige and character of leadership, extent of support, etc. are what they should be. The following thoughts may have some value.

a. Mrs. Lena Ulrich Ewing, Country Women's Council, USA, (The Associated Country Women of the World, should be on your list. She lives at 131 Forest Street, Oberlin, Ohio. She is related to President William Stevenson's wife, by marriage to Adlai Stevenson, and is inspired in her interest, especially in the Country Women of India. The enclosed statement which she sent me on the occasion of the visit here of the experts from the Middle East, indicates that interest. I hope you will be in touch with her and what she seeks to do.

b. The use of the audio visual devices for the cause of general education is something that can well be explored and evidently has been and is applied by you. There are many in this country who can help greatly. Doubtless you know Commander Francis Noel, Director of Audio Visual Education for the State Department in Sacramento. He could be very helpful.

c. The whole matter of scholarships, exchange programs, visitors from other countries, visitors from this country to other countries, etc. is so important. But care must be exercised in the reception, and in the preparation for reception. Please note the attached letter to the chairman of our local hospitality committee.

d. As you of course know, Scott Fletcher, President of the Fund for Adult Education is especially quick on the trigger as to audio visual devices, and had his special experience in this field with the Encyclopaedia Britannica Films. I am enclosing also an old letter from G. H. Griffith of the organization. There is a long story of how they helped me in getting films into the Volksschule of Austria.

e. These documents when I have properly digested them I will pass on to the President of the World Affairs Council, Monterey Branch! I can see where they might be made the subject of special study, -- perhaps there could be a conference of the Council, with you present, to discuss them. After all it is, like salvation, -- the awakening informing and directing of individuals. I hold to the theory that you have to go at it, not only in big ways, mass ways, worlds ways but at "The grass roots". This is fine experimental ground. We have here a constant flow of people, the Language School, alert people, and the wind blows through their minds!

(2) CFA Book Program

a. Who could add anything to what has been so well considered?

b. I wish I could talk to you on the subject of the Institute of American Studies which Prof. Guglielmo Negri is working out at the University of Rome. It was envisioned by him, with the counsel of our Culture Attache, George G. Fox, and the financial support in getting it under way by your trustee, J. D. Zellerbach. His idea, Negri's, was to give a course in "The US Critical Period", showing how the United States out of great travail got under way. The translation of The Federalist and the study of it, point up this endeavor. When I see you I will tell you more.

c. Magazines, books, professional journals, etc. are so much more effective when they go from person to person or institution, in the armosphere of personal acquaintanceship.

d. I have been muchimpressed by the reports of some of our great industrial and manufacturing organizations, and have, myself, sent many of these reports abroad to persons well known to me. For example I have sent the reports, the little notices, the various documents that come to me from the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. I have pointed out the number of Stockholders, the interesting conversation going on between stockholders and management, the fine printing, the light touch, the evidence that in this great and successful organization there is a broad sweep of American people. Also I have drawn attention to the relationship between this company and the Rockefeller benefactions, and have circulated the History of the Rockefeller Foundation which was written by Raymond Fosdick, its one time President.

(3) General Committee Report (July 1954)

a. This is I am sure a very reassuring report for those who have worked at the matter for these four years. Much that is encouraging.

b. I should think somewhere there would exist a list of all the students and other visitors who have been in this country and have returned and who can be counted on to be cooperative. I think of one as an illustration, Mrs. Nazrat Farooki, at the University of Karachi, Art Department, who was out guest and with whom I keep in touch. I would like to tell you what happened here to us and to her, by reason of her visit.

c. Right now the US Government is spending millions to transport the Vietnamese from the communist controlled area. A tragic situation as well you know, is that of the displaced Chinese intellegentsia in Hong Kong. Trying to help them by private benefaction is by no means enough! We should give thought, as a national policy, to these impoverished, unwanted, deteriorating Chinese. There must be some place to which they can be transported, for they are so important, and so distressingly tragic.

d. This new University at Nanyang. What of it What is being done in cooperation with you by the Western College Association, by the Association of American Colleges, by student organizations, by for example fraternities and sororities. These last might be stirred up to some value for the academic world, for outside of room and board, and a curious sense of superiority, they are not of much use to the cause of sound learning and good living. But they could be!

e. Croissants "Magazines for Friendship" strikes me as a good idea, but he needs a board, a wider spread of direction, and not to rush around killing himself in his good zeal! I return the correspondence on this subject, and the report which you received.

(4) CFA Programs in Higher Education

a. The existence, training, sense of moral responsibility, and all else that concerns a "Middle Class" is the focus of the strength of any nation The ins itutions of higher education are vitally important for the building of the strength of the "middle class". Note what is said on the subject in reference to Italy.

b. I am in touch with the officers of the German Gesellschaft fur Auslands kunde. Such an organization, inspired into existence by the Cleveland World Affairs Council, should, suited to the local circumstances exist in every country. How this one got under way by the visit of Hildegarde Heilman, in the US by the invitation of the Department of Labor is well worth exploring.

c. I am very familiar with the workings of the institutions which tie together our colleges and universities, and would be very glad to discuss ways and means of more effective cooperation.

d. I have before me some documents of the Presbyterian Church in reference to its missionary enterprise. The schools and colleges of the various churches can be helpful. I know of a very fine woman, Mrs. Langdon Cheves McCord Smythe who carries on her husbands work in Nagoya. There are some very wise people among these educational missionaries. Dr. Henry S. Houghton in charge of the Peking Medical Union College, now living on this peninsula should certainly be on your list.

e. On the campuses of most colleges there are now these Foreign Student Advisers. They are a group who probably are enlisted to cooperate with CFA. It might be a good idea for them to be especially gathered to confer with you. That would not be difficult to do as to the FSA in our Western Colleges.

f. I know, myself, some key people in almost every college community who have the understanding, the friendly spirit, and the readiness to cooperate in such an important endeavor.

g. You are, of course, expert yourself on the subject of the field of benevolent interest in this endeavor of the various foundations. Just what Ford, Rockefeller, Carnegie, and the others large and small really have established as the area of their interest is something very important, and I am sure needs no counsel from me!

h. I have long held the idea that the noon day clubs can be more significant in this program. They give us a cross section of any community. They tie in with the rest of the world, especially Rotary. Rotary has a plan developed in the name of its founder for student aid. They can be very helpful in the exhibition of American hospitality. They can immediately provide opportunity to become familiar in any field of individual professional interest. They can let out lots of poison. They have power in a community to make clear that we can no longer draw our skirts about us, and move through the muck and mud of the world, and go home to our tea!

(5) Report on Lecture Tour of Japan, by Dr. Jerzy Lerski

a. This is a very important document and wisely distributed and studied I should think would help a lot of our fellow citizens to really understand and seek to help.

b. I wish that you would give me permission to turn over all these documents to the World Affairs Council, Monterey Branch, committee on study groups. This one could be made the subject of a seminar study. These classes will be under way presently and if you think it wise, I will take up the matter with the committee in charge.

c. There are so many ways of revealing the worth of America, which are to be done, quietly, by the sowing of good seed, which come from mutual confidence. I would like very much to go over this document point by point with persons who are in positions to really help.

d. Did Allen Griffin tell you what his sister, Mrs. Paul Webb has been doing with discarded nylon stockings That is a story which illustrates the "good seed department".

e. This paper of Lerski's should be studied by those "higher up".

f. Please let me know as soon as possible if I may use it.

g. We have some very wonderful Japanese-American people, who are in the mood and the position to help. Let me talk to you about that!

h. The local representatives of the various world-aware organizations I am sure are well informed by you. The World Affairs Council of Northern California, the Institute of International Education, the Foreign Policy Association, the United Nations, the International House Organization, The Fulbright Scholarship Counsellors etc.

i. I wonder if a study has been made of the course offering in international affairs, especially with reference to Asia, in the various schools and colleges of the Coast. We have some most outstanding and widely influential college executives on this Coast who are probably aware of what you are doing. When I name to myself such persons as Condliffe, Young, Fisher, Deutsch, White, Coons, Day, Houghton, Odell, Leonard, DuBridge, etc. I am well aware that there are stars in this galaxy!

(6) Civic Consciousness in Non-Governmental Organizations in Asia

a. This paper based on the work of Mr. James Dalton, is just the sort that should be gone over, point by point, by those who are in a position to do something about it. What has happened since it was written and digested.

b. Much is said on the subject of the Philippines. I would like very much to have had it to talk over with these journalists from the Philippines recently our guests and with Admiral-Ambassador Spruance.

c. We have a great many Philippines in various jobs on this Peninsula. They are pretty much outsiders to the life among us. It is by no means easy to live in peace and quiet and be a ~~[illegible]~~ Filipino in the USA. What they have to say as they write hom about life here is something one would like to know.

d. All peoples who have been in a colony relationship to those who have ruled over them, are certainly vulnerable to the propaganda of these enemies who pretend to be the liberators. It takes patience, real friendliness, absence of a "Lady Bountiful" attitude, or those subtle qualities which so often the "good doers" unconsciously exhibit that make the lesser people striving to advance themselves, sore. You cannot fake real spontaneous friendliness and that real spontaneous friendliness and understanding are the base on which a good world for all concerned can be erected.

(7) The use of radio as an instrument for creating better understanding of Asia in America.

a. It would be interesting, important, to take a typical American community and attempt to discover just what is known in the schools, among the merchants, professional men, churches, etc. -- a kind of Gallop poll on the knowledge of Asia and the opinions about it and its leaders and its people. I have done it slightly and have been astounded!

b. The conclusions in the "summary" certainly are reassuring. I hope you are not "kidding yourself".

c. The Foreign Policy Association certainly has now had a long experience and should be the guiding force over the country. I imagine most Americans are as confused as I am, as to just what is our foreign policy at any given time. The President says one thing and the Generals, Clark and van Fleet say something else. Nixon speaks and Knowland denies. The Secretary of State says if you do this there shall be mass retaliation, etc. If you are just a casual reader or for that matter a real student you will wonder just what to think yourself, and you can well imagine what the stranger among us thinks.

d. The Institute of Pacific Relations has been pretty much discredited in the public mind. It is one of the great tragedies that honest efforts made to get at the facts and to consider them mindful of our national ideals, becomes entangled with the infiltrators seeking to discredit, and then along comes McCarthy, or someone like him, and throws out the baby with the bath water.

e. Asians, as you very well know, want to say what they think you want them to say! It is not by any means easy to know exactly what goes on behind the masks. But when you have established through mutual understanding, real friendship, and all of that takes great patience, you do get at what is thought. This sort of understanding needs the atmosphere of "mutuality" and the evidences of cooperation, but to get on with the business of working together, much has to be dones, one by one!

f. And that is where the exchange program can help. But if you have been around a college community, or especially a great big university sprawl, and you see the scene as an Asian, looking different, dark skinned and different in every way, pehaps a devoted Buddhist, and with the accumulated bitterness due to colonial maltreatment, -- even fairly just treatment, a lot goes on inside, which doesn't get mentioned! But you know this is true much better than I do!

(8) Report from Dacca. A CFA Representative explores a program for East Pakistan.

a. I have nothing to add here. This is a careful statement and I am sure the observer was able to observe.

b. I am interested that the alumni association of American returned students was "fanatically" pro American. It would be interesting to examine the record. From what schools in America? What is said that is pro America etc. What opinions for improving the services and treatment? How about college as over against university/ dormitory as over against international house, etc. What do these friends say in defense of the USA when the comments are made to our disfavor, etc. I'd like very much to talk to Mr. Johnson,

(9) Committee's Cultural Program in the Republic of Korea

a. This is very interesting. I wish that you would sometime draw in Dolly Lee, Secretary to Scott Newhall, Editor of the Chronicle. Her brother, the famous diver, has been separated from the army, of which he is a major in the medical corps, to tour Southeast Asia for better understanding and friendliness for the USA. Sammy Lee is ideally fitted for this work, and as an Occidental graduate, he and I have been in steady correspondence since his graduation. Sammy's father was at Occidental, coming to us after the invasion of Korea by the Japanese. This family alone can be very helpful.

b. Please note the enclosed letter from David Gill, an attorney in Pacific Grove. Here is a man who is stirred up to help the Koreans.

c. After the visit of the President Rhee, there has taken place over the country a lot of approving and disapproving talk. This visit and the estimate of it certainly should be a subject for the Committee for Free Asia to go into for a long time.

d. I correspond with several soldiers who have been and who are now in Korea. It is something which should be studied. What have the returned soldiers to say of this land and its people and its future and our connections. I know what some of them say and it isn't pleasant to hear!

(10) "The Invisible University"
The Mencius Educational Assistance Program in Hong Kong

a. This is something concerning which General McClure and Dr. Houghton have strong opinions. I am supposed to meet with them this afternoon to talk over a communication from Mr. Judd. I am quite sure that no one in this country is closer to the situation of the displaced Chinese intellectuals and their tragic situation that Henry Houghton. He has much to say and its specific.

Well that is the last of the papers and above my running comment.

Its touch and go, touch and go, and such confusion of opinion, and such a tremendous opportunity for this country, and blessings on you and your associates. If you approve I will have these reports gone over by a seminar, and by some people who are much more precisely informed than I am.

Thank you for the opportunity to look them over.

Mr. William McCormick Blair
Executive Secretary to Mr. Adlai Stevenson
11 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Bill:-

Thank you for your letter. I wish Adlai could spend a night or two here catching up on some sleep and getting some real rest, but I understand. God guard him that he may be fully restored to health and be ready for the great day of greatest responsibility which is coming, sure and soon!

I smile to myself when I look at his letter to me written now quite long ago when he said that what he most wanted was to be left alonsto be a good Governor, in which office he was exceedingly happy. Well, they did not leave him alone and he now must carry the torch and give the "Call to Greatness".

One of the inescapable problems of any devoted leader like Adlai is to discover others to share the responsibilities who are competent, morally firm, and consecrated for public service. Both great parties are let down by the time-serving ones who cluster about and distress the leaders. Right now General Eisenhower has a plenty of them.

I wish that some great Foundation -- Rockefeller for instance -- would make a special study of this matter. I wish it would come up with a plan for the colleges and universities to train men and women for the special services which must be done now, all over the world.

My impression, from what I have seen, here, there and yon, is that a great many who are employed by our government and by industry and by the foundations themselves, are pretty much there for the ride.

Adlai will be out here presently in San Francisco and in Los Angeles, and I want him, and you, to be sure in LA to take a good look at Raymond McKelvey, and in SF at Fred Farr. I have written to you about them.

Please glance over the enclosed letters which will show you my emotions.

Our best to Adlai, Carol, et al...

Dear Ward:-

Thank you very much for your kind letter of the 3rd which I have just received. Your words of appreciation of what I did, is oil on the wick! I did not feel that I was by any means as helpful as I wanted to be, and I want you to know that I am with you in this endeavor, to the hilt, and will do anything I can to further this most important and proved effort to turn the tide from evil to faith!

It is especially interesting to me to see you, so smart in advertising wares, turn your talent — thus consecrated — to this cause!

I will get in touch with the various bookstores, as indicated in the enclosed, and will do anything I can to proclaim this book and this offer. Just send me a package of the "Certificates".

Helen and I are hoping very much that we can work things out so we can go back to Europe and follow up on what happened when we made this study for the Fund for Adult Education.

I have, because of that study, and by reason of my activity in the World Affairs Council and the Institute of International Education, established, really over the world!, friends who are deep rooted. I would like, if we do go, to follow up for you in reference to this book, and this broadcast, and if we do, I will seek out an opportunity to talk with you before we go.

I am enclosing a self explanatory letter to my friend, Zlatko Baloccwic, the very talented violinist who seeks most earnestly to advance the cause of true democracy and who also is a man possessed by a great faith.

Please note also what I have written to Albert Ruddock who has just taken over the Presidency of the Board of Trustees of the California Institute of Technology. Albert is also a great friend of Ed's and a believer in him!

Larry Barretto, who was asked to do a broadcast TIB, has never escaped from the doing, and after making the recording he sat down and wrote himself out on the subject in a manuscript which is at the moment in the hands of his agent in New York. By the way I think Larry's statement was a very beautiful one, — not too well recorded — but I have never received word of its being used!

What I suggested to Larry is that he should have his agent take the MSS to Simon and Schuster, and if that strikes you as a good idea I will urge him to do just this. Books of this sort, that reveal how someone, just someone like the rest of us, has found what they can live by, and very much needed in this Tohu-Bohu, where we hang by our finger tips on the edge of the abyss!

George Fox, who has been our Cultural Attache at Rome, is to be our guest during late March and April. He will deliver the Remsen Bird lectures at Occidental, and will speak in all the sities of any size, u and down the coast. I have charge of the arrangements.

I wish very much that he could have some good exploring talking with you concerning TIB, the book, and the story of the USA as it should be told abroad, and especially in Italy.

These Cultural Attaches, in every embassy, should be alerted with reference to this book, and also the officers of the United States Information Administration. Dr. Guy Snavely, for many years executive secretary of the Association of American Colleges, is now a consultant with the USIA. Ed also knows him very well.

If you would like to have m e do it, I will make a careful report for you of well placed friends, I know, to whom I could write, and perhaps see, to assist in getting this book and all that it means — here there and YON!

At this moment I am interrupted by Henry Houghton who calls to tell me of the classes which have been set up by the World Affairs Council on "The Middle East". Now Henry Houghton and General McClure — both TIBs! — are as well informed as anybody on the people and problems and possibilities of the Far East. I will enlist their interest in this book, and in getting from them bright ideas!

Most of the suggestions which I might make, I am sure have already occurred to you and progress is being made in furtherance of the same, -- but I could go at this with a bang, if you wanted me to do it.

Among other counsellors, there could be none better than President Emeritus of the American University of Beirut, Bayard Dodge. Bayard is living in Princeton, 19 Alexander Place, and is responsible for the coming to this country of the leaders and experts of the Middle East some months ago. We had the pleasure of entertaining many of them here. Bayard should certainly be one of your TIBs, for there is no one who is more respected in all of the USA than this wonderful kind and able man.

I keep thinking of many I know to whom I could write and who would immediately respond, -- and that I will do.

Take these journalists we had here a short time ago from Southeast Asia. One of them was Amadeo Dacanay, editor of the leading newspaper of the Philippines. Allen Griffin was the host and he let us share that privilege. One of the occasions was the jaunt over the 17 Mile Drive. In my car were the Dacanays. As we past Bing's house I called attention to it, and they made me stop the car while they took a picture.

Says, Priscilla Dacanay, "Do you think you would get for me a picture from Bing Crosby with a personal greeting? He is such a fine ambassador of America in the Southeast Asia. Never anything we must apologize for, -- we who are friends of the USA."

I got that picture and Bing wrote her a letter, and you should read the reply. I'll send it to you. I could, I think marshal many of these journalists through this region of so much tension and fear and misguidance.

O, but I must stop!! How you did open wide this faucet.

Dear Albert:-

First of all our congratulations to all concerned in your acceptance of the chairmanship of this most important Board and we are sure in this office you are destined to have the very greatest satisfaction.

The Poniatowskis are here and they tell us that you and Margaret are scooting off in every direction most of the time, but principally to Moab where you now have a house. We have not heard recently just how matters Uranium-wise are proceeding, but there is no one in the entire wide wide world, known to us, who has more understanding of what money is for than you and Maragret, and may the uranium concentrate itself in your mines!

We have been here steadily all summer and it will take a lot of dynamite to get us out. There are so many affairs of this locale into which we dip, that the time goes gaily by, — but believe me, — a little too too fast.

One of these days I want to explore with you, — in your new job! — the problems and possibilities with reference to the coming and going, over the face of the globe, of leaders and experts, students an d scholars. The number so doing is now in the tens of thousands — 30, 000 in colleges and universities this year! and the exchange costs lots of money! As I have written to you — you a bit critical of the whole business! — it is very much worth doing if care is exercised all along the line — picking and sorting, orienting, receiving, and serving and then the return. This has become a kind of "vocation" for me, and I intend to work at it the best way I can, from here out.

There are a great many of these students at Cal Tek. Winch has ideas which you might like to explore.

Enough for now. Yes, read this letter to Ward Wheelock!
Love to both. Give us a call sometime when you pass by your house!

Dear Jack:-

Please read this material which I have just received from Ward Wheelock and also his letter on the subject of this new edition of "This I Believe". You are well aware of my interest in this fine endeavor to clean up the waters of the world!

I want very much to have your counsel and your assistance in helping him.

(1) I will get at the college world when Arthur Coons, my able successor comes up here presently.

(2) Also I will get at the churches, which will be easy enough.

(3) I should think that all who have aprticipated in this broadcast, wherever they are, would be a committee of most effective cooperation.

(4) We have now spread all over the world thousands and thousands of returned students, experts, leaders etc. whose names are immediately available through the Institute of International Education. As chairman of the hospitality committee for the World Affairs Council, I have my own list, and I correspondmm regularly with many of them.

(5) Also I think Allen will help me give it a boost through the Monterey Peninsula Herald, and Scottie an d Joe Jackson through the Cmronicle. etc.

(6) But you come in for guidance with reference to those who sell and buy books! See?

(7) Then I have these connections which I made when Helen and I wandered over the face of Western Europe seeking to find out how it was with the returned ones....

I speak for your help.

Dr. Eugene Carson Blake,

Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia

Dear Gene:-

Kindest greetings and warm good wishes! Its a long time!

But you are very frequently in our minds and always in our hearts. And may you find the greatest satisfaction in this work for which you are so admirably furnished.

I have been reading all that comes my way on the great gathering at Evanston and I presume one of these days there will be a full report, something like the one that came out many decades ago, of the Edinburgh conference. Remember? All those pink bound books!

But I am writing at this time to make a suggestion. In your city is a friend, Ward Wheelock. He has been the fire which has produced the broadcast This I Believe, and the books, and the records, and the result has been certainly good for turning the tide from evil to good, from fear to faith, from misguidance as to what we are really like to a more fair consideration.

Ward is a very high-powered advertising concern, and in this broadcast, his talent has been harnessed to this cause of the Spirit.

What I would like very much to see happen is for you to give him a call on the telephone, and invite him to luncheon and then to have the two of you dip inside, and then let me know what happens, because, I know much will happen. You are both pretty high powered.

I am on the air over CBS, on This I Believe, on the 28th of this month. If you have time listen. Also I have another friend in this broadcasting business in Philadelphia, Donald Thornburg. Ask him to eat with you toooo!

Tony and Phylis Freeman were with us during their vacation from Rome. What worthy children of worthy parents!

PEACE PRAYER

"Lord make me an instrument of Thy peace; where there is hatred, let me sow love; where there is injury, pardon; where there is doubt, faith; where there is despair, hope; where there is darkness, light; and where there is sadness, joy.

"O Divine Master, grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled as to console; to be understood, as to understand; to be loved, as to love: for it is in giving that we receive, it is in pardoning that we are pardoned, and it is in dying that we are born to eternal life."

My dear Ed:-

Helen and I have just heard this clear, forthright analysis of the present situation, and we have never heard anything clearer or more forthright or more timely -- which Howard K. Smith, has just made from Geneva.

It is very important to us that we have a copy of this statement. He certainly put it on the line!

I wish I could have a tape recording, but I presume that it impossible. But please have your secretary give me as soon as possible the script.

Sent 5/7 RM

We are leaving here on the 10th and will be in Illinois for about two weeks. We are going by automobile and will arrive in Springfield, and will be at The Leland, about the 18th.

Also let me express our enthusiastic endorsement of this program which Lyman is directing. When the man said that we had no friends in the Arab countries -- or words to that effect -- he certainly said something that is not true.

We entertained a while back in cooperation with the Middle East Institute and our very good friend, the wise and informed Bayard Dodge, representatives of most of the Near East countries and I know that we have many friends in all these countries.

I do not like the idea of a "chosen" race, be it German, Jewish or Swiss!

Sometime ago I had occasion to read -- objectively -- for Charlie Laughton the Old Testament to find passages for his Bible reading, and what is said therein of God and his people and what is to happen and should happen to the poor Goim, made me tremble tremble. Take a look sometime at Ezra and Nehemiah, and even some passages in Isaiah.

No the idea of the Jews being God's people, underlies this whole tension. The idea of a Holyland that is theirs is wrong wrong. They should never have gone into a country where these Arabs as Canaanites were before they took over and where they have been since the colapse of the Roman Empire. But they are there and God of the Jews and the Gentiles, please help us to work it out with the spirit of St. Francis, as indicated in the enclosed.

Please send me at your earliest convenience this magnificent statement of your colleague, Howard K. Smith.

Dr. Lyman Bryson,

Dear Lyman:-

We have just listened to your program on the tensions in the Middle East and then the magnificent clean forthright and true statement of Howard K. Smith! What a morning!

I have just written to Ed on the subject and am enclosing a copy for you.

You probably are in touch with the Middle East Institute and Bayard Dodge and Stephen Penrose and a lot of others who know how it is in that potential Armageddon.

As to our not having friends in the Arab countries that is a very unfair and untrue statement. We have plenty.

It was a grave mistake for the State of Israeli to have been established in the first place, and the pressure for it came to a large degree from the Zionists, as you very well know. And for them the "Chosen" race, with God's intentions for them made clear, is something different and special and much more important than the rest of us.

When my Jewish friend, Monroe Deutsch has spoken for the cause of humanity, for Jewry as a religion and not a second nationalism, he has been pretty badly manhandled.

I had occasion to express my own views on this subject to the organization in New York promoting the Israeli cause and didn't I get called anti-semitic!

I cannot see any solution, myself, to this world tohu-bohu by the increase of nationalism. In fact I, who am as you know generally full of affirmations and optimism, find myself looking into the skies for some kind of being to come from there to show us the way. But I know that will not happen.

All this hate hate, smear smear, all this use of "myths" to discredit the party not in control, — and all this careless inquisition that this strange guy from Wisconsin has promoted has robbed this country of wise critics and has softened us for just what is happening at this moment in Geneva.

I must pause and weep a little.

God bless you and your kind.

Miss Florence M. Worrell,

US Department of Labor, Women's Bureau
Washington, 25, D. C.

My dear Miss Worrell:-

Thank you for your most thoughtful and courteous letter of the 22nd, concerning the visit of Dr. Brommenschenkel to the Monterey Peninsula. Her gracious comments are very much appreciated and I am sorry to say, not as well deserved as we could wish.

We were not as well prepared for her coming as we should have been and the arrangements got a bit entangled. But her comments show her fine spirit, and we found her a most delightful person and she has left a good impression here, and we hope that her visit to this country has proved for her, and that much more for you, the value of this kind of visitation.

It is my very strong conviction, out of now considerable experience, that these visitors, students, scholars, leaders and experts, when carefully selected, properly oriented, and well cared for in the place of visitation and residence, can be among the most useful friends, for their own countries and for the proper understanding of the true character of our beloved land.

There is so much going on that is distressing and in the present concern that careless inquisitors may tear the country to pieces, it is not infrequently the case, that visitors coming to our America, return with wierd ideas of just what are the main currents of thought and action.

But when there is opportunity to bring such visitors into the homes, and to care for their interests as they make them known, then the result can be most valuable, that I am sure, and having spent a half year in Europe checking up, I can give many illustrations.

Enough for now.

The best to you and if there is anything we can do in this fair spot, you let us know.

Dear David:-

Thank you for your letter of the 26th which has just arrived and which I am pleased to answer immediately. When the records come I shall certainly listen with care and will comment as best I can.

I wish very much I could talk with you, for I think I have some bright ideas which might be helpful.

You should know, by now, that I never let a friend escape me, and Jack was my friend, and because of that, as well as my interest in your project and an awareness of its value, I want to know everything I can about what you are doing and how you are coming along.

During the past year, Ward Wheelock asked me to help pick persons to broadcast in the program "This I Believe" and I have enjoyed this assignment very much.

Wherever and whenever it is possible to say "YES", it helps for we are living in a time of tremendous peril to the cause of well founded affirmation.

It the days of fear, tension, enemies, misguidance, and a lot else we are in great danger of getting off the track and in the well founded fear of a real enemy we can take on his methods and in taking on his methods form ourselves into his very likeness.

So the problem is to some degree the harnessing of all the forces that make for education, enlightenment, public opinion, entertainment, and whatever else there be, to protect and prove the value of the open mind, the hearty laugh, the faith in our way of life, and the value of youth thinking anything they darn please, that through their young, daring and objective thought we may get on with the business of better living.

Now I am sure that the record business fits into this matter, and I think I can be helpful to you, which I most decidedly want to be, and with no obligations on your part whatever! So cheers!

Dear Ed:-

Now McCarthy will attack the networks. We shall watch to see if they knuckle under! Public schools, churches, universities and colleges, departments of government, the army, various liberal institutions with honest intentions, certain distinguished individuals, etc. etc. How he does follow the proved pattern which the demagogues have employed through the ages.

During the pre-reformation days there was a group of gay souls who thought that the best way to break down the claimants to infallibility over state and church was to spoof them.

They wrote imaginary letters to a man named Ortius Gladius under the title of "Letters of Obscure Men". For a time they were regarded as authentic and commended and then the truth came out. They helped a lot in extricating the New Learning from the powers that would destroy the same.

Its an idea; but it would be I think profitable for the saving of those who were born free, to collect letters of such a sort addressed to this strange creature who is, whatever he thinks are his motives, is softening us for an American brand of a pusher around!

Yes.

Anyway if you have a moment you might read the enclosed.

It could be done better, but it helped me on a certain day to release some pent up emotions.

What we really need is someone like the little Saint of the Umbrian Valley. I am enclosing one of his prayers. I am not easily moved to satire for this that is going on moves me rather to tears and prayers than to scoffing and such.

The Honorable, Joseph McCarthy
The Senate of the United States
Washington, D. C. (Top Secret!)

Dear Joe:-

We certainly have them on the run now! Now we must be exceedingly careful, for some of these birds may see what is really going on, and it is important that they do not see! My counsel is that we begin at once, and very very quietly to organize the Purple Shorts and I suggest that we call them, when the time comes for us to get the power of such organization into the open, "The Sons of Freedom". I am enclosing a picture of the uniform, insignia, etc. which you will want to look over.

What I would like to see worked out at once, is groups of ten in every community, in every organization, in every school, among the politicos, the business men, even in organized labor if we can get in, and in the churches, who can be absolutely counted on to report, to propagate, and to spread into the larger groups when the time is ready.

You can always learn from those who have sought to get control in other lands and in other days. The organization that Togliatti has produced in Italy is an example, also Hitler, also Lenin, and there are as you well know many other illustrations in the past.

The country is now thoroughly softened. These frightened pigeons are ready to fly in any direction to save the land from the communists and the fellow travelers, they see everywhere. They now distrust everybody except you!

The year 1956 is not far off and we must be ready! By the time it comes around we must be thoroughly organized and whatever these poor saps who back Eisenhower may plan, we shall be smarter. You will be one of the candidates, the Dewey Forces will swing to you. You will be the candidate, and then the President, and all so legal, and all so hunky dory. Remember how Hitler worked it out. You can learn even from the devil. Poor Hindenberg. Poor Ike!

Where are we now. As your specialist in propaganda, let me give you a kind of reassuring summary;

(1) We have liquidated the egg-heads! Harvard University, that refuge of the sissies and the subversives. Its President you have thoroughly slapped down as well he deserved, for as I recall he was pretty nasty when he was in Lawrence. You failed in getting Conant, but don't worry about that. We'll catch up with him presently. The whole crazy loyalty oath business has well fogged the mind of the Californians and most of the more conservative still think that's a hot bed of communism. And as for the Middle West, good old Red Grange has now liquidated Stoddard, who has been a real power in this effort to keep America in the World understanding groove!

As to the rest of the colleges and universities, we have some pretty powerful trustees and regents and benefactors who are thoroughly suspicious of anyone who present controversial issues!, and fewer and fewer of these so-called scholars want to stick their necks out. Economic necessity is a powerful weapon on our side.

(2) As to Public Education, thanks to Zoll and his campaign against progressive education, and frills and furbelows, and for the three rs, and all that Hearst did in paving the way, and the work of the various sappy patriotic societies over the country, who slap down anybody who has anything to say that isn't right in the groove, and with the little guys needing the money in the monthly check to pay for the new baby, over the country from the superintendents down to the janitors public education is thoroughly intimidated, and soft as butter.

(3) Let us take a look at the Protestant Clergy and the Protestant Churches. There was a time when these were very powerful in this country. They have stiff necks and believe that no one should push them around, and they seem to think that the teachings of this Jesus on love and such guff can be applied to meet the problems which people face in town and country and business and government. They are starry eyed in this but they have been pretty tough when it comes to standing up for the -- what they call, the freedom of the conscience. But we have them now getting soft. There are so many of the trustees and elders of churches who are afraid of all this socialism, which they mix up with what these preachers say, that thousands of them are talking more about theology, pie in the sky and what happens after death and less about politics and what is going on in the world.

These churches are made up for the most part of frightened bourgeois who want to hang on to their investments, who have observed what is wrong in the world and who blame it all on the democrats and among the democrats on the pinkos who are in their minds fellow travelers and as such Fifth Amendment communists, and are not to be trusted. That is the screwy way their minds run, but you old screwer have helped to make them so! Very naughty, Hey what?

The Velde attack built on absolutely nothing threw about a lot of sand and there are some ministers of great power who are completely on our side and who can be counted on to work against us. But watch watch very carefully, this John Mackay, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church who got out a letter to the 8,000 Presbyterian Churches against you and your method, and watch Bromley Oxnam, the top bishop of the Methodist church going over the country shooting his face, and the Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church, this man Sherrill. He sits with the rich and mighty and a lot of the rich and mighty are very much more concerned with Christian principles than they are with their accumulated gain. They are very very dangerous.

(4) As to the government, the poor sappy government! There is where you have had your greatest success. The people who are in the State Department are thoroughly cowed. You even had Acheson cowed, and in this liquidation business and in bringing up opinions expressed long ago, you have something on nearly everybody of any importance in that arm of the government. No one in the State Department now would really dare come out against you.

And who in any other branch of the Federal Government will dare come out flat foot against you. Its all ready for you there, believe me.

(4) Hitler was so smart in getting the patriotic organizations back of him. His technic was superb. The Jews are against our chosen people! The enemy is rings around. Look out for the subversives within. We want our Saar and our Ruhr, and we want to get rid of this Weimar crowd who don't know their right hands from their left. The Sons of the Revolution, give you their plaques! The Daughters of the Revolution swear by you. The Veterans of Foriegn Wars, by and large are on your side, and want everybody every year or thereabouts to take the oath. And there are the Liberty Belles, and the Pro Americas, and the Christian Economists, and the American Legiona chapters — not all of them — we must look into this.

But wherever you go if the conversation turns to you and your method, always someone stands up and says, "Well he's got the communists on the run. What more do you want!" Very good.

(5) Let us report on the Roman Catholics. We've got to silence the Jesuitical "America" and this Catholic pinko sheet, "The Commonweal". They can do us a lot of damage. But Cardinal Spellman is out and out for you and he is the most powerful priest in the USA and he may be the Pope. It could be. It could be! Talk to any group in any town in America now, that is right of center, and someone will say, "Well, the Catholics are against the communists, and the protestants are wishy washy, so I am for the catholics!" Good, I say, very very good.

(6) Now the writers and the painters and the musicians and all these other dreamers who get easily cockeyed ideas. I am making for you a catalogue of them. I will list those that are reds, and those that write like reds and those that we can count on. There are writers who have tried out the communist line and have swung over, but they have the same kind of psychology, in whatever category you find them. They who once fall for the guy that tells them what to think are your meat. We need some good writers, commentators, radio announcers, and makers of songs! By the way, we need a good song? I must find you someone to write it, a real bang up song like Giovenezza, or the Horst Wessel thing or the International. Nothing like a song. Think what the Marsellaise did for the revolutionaries in France? Very important that I find you a good song.

(7) Now the Army and the Navy. The Navy will be easy. Those guuys don't know much of what is going on, and they are picked pretty carefully by those who want to be sure that they will be easy on the ship. They can for the most part be counted on. There are stiff necked ones in the Army, but you have them on the run. It got a bit dangerous there for a bit, but very soon the Zwicker affair will be forgotten and the fact that you found a communist promoted and honorably discharged will not be forgotten. When we get this special Purple Shirt organization well oiled, we will filter into the army and they will behave, they will behave. The conflict between the Westpointers, who also don't know much outside the military and the Reserve officers is right down your alley. "There's not to reason why. There's but to do and die!" Well we can use them, living or dying.

(8) The Press! That is easy, easy. There is no real democratic press. The pink sheets, the New Republic for example are struggling to exist. Most of the newspapers of the little towns are republican and on our side. The New York Times, the Herald Tribune, the Washington Post, and a few others we have to watch, but give us time, give us time. As to the Periodicals few read the slicks, Henry Luce has an Achilles heel, and Raymond Moley has a grudge against the New Dealers, his heel! When we take over we will have a list and we will have local leaders who will know when and how to turn the newspapers to shout for you. No difficult job, that!

(9) Commentators, columnists, Radio broadcasters, TV shows and comments, all this sound and fury that goes over the air. The sponsors are shrewd enough to know whose voice wins soap buyers and whose doesn't. Little by little we get rid of the ones that speak out. Fulton Lewis is superb and I should imagine he would be the one we would want to give the whole plan when it seems a proper time to you. Ed Murrow, Cecil Brown, Elmer Davis, even Kaltenborn we must discredit. We haven't been able to get anything on Murrow, but we will.

(10) Nixon, Dirksen and Jenner have what it takes. They are tough, ruthless, and are on your side. They should know that there are top places in the New Government. Nixon certainly grows in Savvy, and he is becoming very popular over the country with the old ladies and the frightened pigeons. I would pull him in close pretty soon.

(11) The Democrats are more and more divided. We can play them against one another. The bogey of the negro is all we need in the South. In the North the New Dealers and the Anti New Dealers are at one another's throats now. Adlai Stevenson is the most powerful force they have, but whenever he speaks we have immediatelythe power of Winchell and Lewis and the Press to show him up as the one who is causing the hatred and bitterness and division of our times. Nixon did a good job in the Campaign in tying Hiss to his tail! But he is smart. We have to watch him.

So much for now.

I have been making a careful study of just how Lenin, Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, and Mao got the countries softened and then took over. I am also making a very very careful study of how it was that Hitler and Mussolini lost out!

Keep at it big boss! Don't bother to answer. Just go on to the next attack. Attack! That is the motto! Throw sand in their eyes and mud in their faces. and in 1956 we take over.

Yours for Freedom!

My dear George:-

Thank you for your letter from San Francisco and the note concerning Harold Fisher and Dr. Timoshenko. You will presently tell me what this is all about! Harold will be down here to-morrow for a Stanford Conference and Helen has invited a few friends in to talk with him. We are at the moment especially interested in the location of the Ford founded, Institute of Human Behavioral Studies. Monterey is an ideal place for it!

The other after noon I met the widow of Walter Lyman Brown, a distinguished mining engineer, associated with Mr. Hoover, William Honnold and others in Belgian relief, friend of the Various famous mining engineers, Harvey Mudd, etd.

They lived in Russia in connection with the work of mining explorations and helping Mr. Hoover in the work of relief he undertook there during the famine time! Remember?

She talked to me with great interest and precision concerning the Russian people and she shares completely your ideas. This cruel fearful government will pass. It is the product of some strange philosophy, opportunism, and the accumulated evil that blew up the top.

The Russian people are possessed by and large of great talents and have a tremendous future. The land is rich beyond all compare in minerals and other resources. It is, as she says, as the USA was in the days of Lewis and Clark.

We must be ready to cooperate and to work with these people when the day arrives that it will be possible. That day will come!

This point of view interests me intensely, and especially when I realize that over the hill there are 200 Russians teachings hundreds of Army personnel the Slavic Language and there are Slavic students, especially under your care, spread across the land.

Cruelty, evil, malice, bitterness, mal treatment of various sorts pass in time, but faith, hope and love are eternal!

Dear Ed:-

I have to write you a "fan letter" once in a while, for I find doing the same is good for me, and I know that I represent millions who think as I do and who are not so quick on the doing of this sort of thing!

So.

Thank you for that magnificent broadcast on the resources of the country. It just could not have been more convincing, informing exciting and effective. If only formal education, — frequently so dull dullcould learn of you!

Thank you for the daily summing up of the news. Knowing you the shades of your voice help us to know what you really think, keeping yourself properly so scrupulously objective!

Thank you and Janet for the Christmas card with the picture of the smart and growing Casey.

We read the profile, not completely pleased with what Charles Wertenbaker did to you!

Please note the letter to George Fox.

I think I have informed you about this fine thing that Guglielmo Negri and George Fox are doing at the University of Rome. Negri was an exchange student at Harvard. He went back to Rome to teach Politcal Science. He developed the idea of giving a course in the US Critical Period, — from the Revolution through the adoption of the Constitution. He needed some money for the translation of the Federalist and for some other help. David Zellerbach, President of the Zellerbach Corporation gave him the money. Now the idea expands and the plan is to build at the University of Rome and through it, hopefully, elsewhere, an Institute of American Studies. In this George Fox is giving the prime advice.

David as you know was in charge of the effort to help Italy get on its feet, under Paul Hoffman's supervision. He worked hard!

Your henchman at Rome might like to explore this effort and give you first hand comments.

It lures me!

Tom

Would you please!

Mr. Ward Wheelock
THIS I BELIEVE,
The Lincoln Liberty Bldg.,
Philadelphia, Pa.

My dear Ward:-

Your letter, the record, newspaper clipping etc. have just arrived and you must know how relieved I am to hear from you, and that twister done in your own hand! Really how it does show the pressure, the intense interest and the imagination!

Please don't feel concerned about not writing. My distress was due to the long silence and the wonder if all was proceeding, between you and me, as you wished. Now I know, so you can relax on that one.

I must see you soon, for this business of promoting a better society by the interweaving of peoples, by the statement of faith, and by the power of such organizations as The World Affairs Council, The Institute of International Education, and the various other groups at work on the selection and serving of the right people to come and go, — is something with which I am precisely familiar. Also I know I can continue to help efficiently this cause.

Please note AND READ the enclosed column from the Monterey Peninsula Herald. I have made by this visitation of the Muslim leaders some well rooted friendships and I want to talk to you about the proper exploiting of your records among the Arabs. Please note the enclosed on that subject.

I have had some very pleasant correspondence with Mr. Frank Abrams and Mr. Minton of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and will see them when I go to NewYork. As you know Mr. Abrams is a trustee of Syracuse, the leader in this effort to draw together the schools and the benefaction of the corporations — with no pushing around! My successor at Occidental, a very brilliant and exceedingly able man, is in New York with Mr. Abrams now in the organization of this Council. You should be a member!

I want to go back to Europe next April and I want to talk to you about that.

You sound overwhelmed with the pressure of many ideas. Don't let me add to any burden, but at least leaf over the enclosed. Please have Mrs. Colgan send me some stationery!

We'll be seeing you soon.

Dr. George Fox,
Culture Attache,
The US Embassy, Rome, Italy

My dear Dr. Fox:-

Enclosed is a note from Ward Wheelock, Secretary of the Eisenhower Fellowship Committee about to take off for a very quick look-see around the world. He is doing so in the interest of the Fellowship Program -- of which I am enclosing a folder, and in spreading the sunshine of his amazingly effective program THIS I BELIEVE.

I have urged him to see certain people as he goes along that I know, but he has many other, and I am sure better informed sources of recommendation.

But I have stressed the value of a conference with you and I certainly hope you will be alerted to his coming and will have time for some good long uninterrupted talk.

Ward is a powerhouse! He has tremendous drive, so strong that I wonder that he can contain it!

He is in the advertising business and is one of Ed Murrow's chief supporters.

I want very much to have him understand exactly what you are doing, with Monaco and Negri and others in this proving of the value of The Institute of American Studies at Rome. It is that sort of assistance that really grows the roots!

Our plans are still chaotic. We are so comfortable here, and have so many happy experiences as "bleacher coaches", that it will take a lot of "nobility" to dig us out, but the possibility of a "follow up" on what happened in 52, at Rome, Strasbourg, Munich and Salzburg especially, has its lure.

I want very much to keep in touch with you and one of these days to do ~~[illegible]~~ some efficient plotting!

In the meantime, keep your eyes out for Wheelock, and with kindest regards from Helen and your great admirer,

Sincerely

Dr. Harold Fisher, Director
The Hoover Library,
Stanford, California

My dear Dr. Fisher:-

Thank you for your immediate interest and understanding of the project, -- with reference to Mr. Saligram Chaturvedi, President of the Teacher Training School at Dewas, India.

You will be glad to know that Superintendent Glen T. Goodwill has arranged to provide him with the textbooks covering the over-all course of study in the public schools of Monterey!! Very good start.

As he did his work while in this country on the Fulbright subvention at the University of Syracuse, I have written to President Tolley and I am sure he will take up the matter with Dr. Eurich. I hope that the Ford people will see in this man, his ideas, and his project, and the means available to him, a way to promote the good cause!

Sometime when it is convenient I should like to talk to you concerning the proper advice for a young friend in whom we are both interested, -- Miss Jean McClure.

Bob is -- and Eve is -- good friends and I want to help Jean do what she wants to do, which is to spend some months in Europe.

It is good for her to do this. She has a real interest in the better understanding and cooperation among the nations and she wants to fit herself to be more useful with reference thereto.

The question immediately needing decision is, shall she go this summer, between junior and senior years or wait until she has finished and then perhaps take on a job!

I keep in touch with several of the offices concerned with such matters, but I am well aware that your connections are much widerand deeper.

Incidentally -- and not so incidentally the young lady makes "A" in every subject.

I am planning to see Carl Spaeth, at his convenience either here or at Palo Alto in the near future.

I want very much to go back to Europe and follow up on what has happened to these returned students, a subject which has for a long time engaged my attention!! Also while in Italy I became greatly interested in the effort that Guglielmo Negri, Professor of Political Science, is doing to build an Institute of American studies, at the University of Rome. My correspondence is in David Zellerbach's office. He gave me a generous gift to help this cause. I have a few letters for you to look over.

Achievements of Democracy

Steve Mather and Parks

By REMSEN BIRD

This morning I received a letter from a friend of many years, who lives in Cloverdale, Calif. In the letter was this paragraph:

"Then I must go and mail copies of a telegram we sent yesterday to the President, copies to Messrs. Knowland, Kuchel, Scudder and Nixon. Said telegram saying in effect, Mr. President, please save the tracks of Dinosaurs made in the Dinosaur National Monument and don't let a damn dam go there!"

Well informed about this matter, by my neighbor, C. Edward Graves, Western representative of one of the leading conservation groups, the National Park Association, I have done about the same, though what I have written has not been so cleverly couched!

The story of our National Parks and Monuments is a grand and glorious one. Many have labored hard, especially in the last fifty years that they should be established, protected, and serve the people. Many have envisioned clearly their importance, have fought off the marauders, planned the roads, camps, hotels, ease of access, and persuaded their fellow countrymen to enjoy the privileges thus provided. Some have given with unstinted generosity, their time, talents, and money that these places, beautiful, historic, and otherwise significant might be unspoiled, might be made available for the enjoyment of all.

Many who have so served our nation might be named—these especially: Theodore Roosevelt, John Muir, Franklin K. Lane, John D. Rockefeller Jr., and Stephen Mather — above all others, Stephen Mather.

Stephen Mather was a man I knew through many years. America never produced a more devoted servant! God bless his memory. God guard, especially now, what he wrought for the good of his country!

At this moment, when it is touch and go, whether the Dinosaur National Monument shall be, or shall not be, covered with the waters of a dam, we do well to think of him and what he, above all people in the establishment of the National Parks, accomplished.

Readers of this column would find it well worth while to read the story of his life, told by Robert Shankland, in a book, published by Alfred Knopf, in 1951. This book is in all our Peninsula libraries.

They would also find it well worth while to be informed concerning the possibilities now to be faced, after 16 years protection by laws, of the invasion of these national parks and monuments by those who would use them for other than our common good.

Stephen T. Mather was a Chicago industrialist, who made many millions by the mining and sale of borax. He was a great lover of the out-of-doors. He was a member of the Sierra Club and with fellow members climbed the California mountains, and tramped over the neglected and exploited parks as they were now many years ago.

Through these experiences he became aware of their condition. They were badly managed. They were poorly financed. They were without decent roads. The accommodations were extremely poor. They were a disgrace to the nation! Something should be done about it! So he wrote a strong letter of criticism to the Department of the Interior and got this answer:

"If you don't like the way the parks are being run, come down to Washington, and run them yourself!"

This he did through 14 years. As a result, we have, through this entire country and the Hawaiian Islands, a magnificent system of public parks.

Out of his own pocket he gave with unrestrained generosity. By his character, enthusiasm, understanding, he persuaded others to do as he had done. He wrote the necessary laws for the protection of the parks and monuments and stood by them until they were enacted.

* * *

In St. Paul's Cathedral in London is a tablet to Sir Christopher Wren, which reads, "If you seek his monument, look about you!"

In many of the parks there are bronze tablets blazoning the name of Steve Mather, which read:

"He laid the foundation of the National Park Service, defining and establishing the policies under which its areas shall be developed and conserved, unimpaired for future generations, There will never come an end to the good he has done."

Beautiful, isn't it?

May I commend to the readers of this column, again, the story of the life of Stephen Mather, and may I urge us all to be wary in the presence of those who would undo what he has done.

Let us be on guard that these parks and monuments may not be lost to us and the future generations by greed, carelessness, misguidance and indifference.

The tablet reads, "There will never come an end to the good he has done!"

No?

THIS I BELIEVE

Dear Ward:-

Dear Ed: Glance at please Remsen

1. Federal personalities
2. Follow up on believers
3. Eisenhower fellowships
4. Foreign Service League
5. Teacher training for world understanding
6. American institutes in other lands, - Rome experience
7. The training of scientists and their readiness for government service.

8. This one concerns the American tourists!

Yesterday I spent several hours with my friend Bob Blum, President of the Asia Foundation. How I wish you and he could get together and sparkle for the causes in which, I am sure, you are both interested!

I read to him my letter to you, (No. 7) and that became the beginning of our talk, which ran from eight o'clock to eleven! A very fine opportunity for me.

He had just come back from another inspection trip ~~to~~ in Southeast Asia. He spoke to a full house here at Monterey-Carmel under the auspices of the World Affairs Council. I wish you could have heard him.

In our conversation we also discussed this book, which Martin Flavin, who knows India pretty well, said is a MUST -- An American in India, by Saunders Redding. It relates also to the subject of this eighth letter to you. This book is a report on the Indian dilemma and the nature of her conflicts.

What I now have to say is abundantly illustrated with precise comment by Robert Blum and Saunders Redding and Martin Flavin. And I should imagine by you also from your own wanderings in foreign places.

We are not very smart in dealing with other nations on the personal level. The peoples of other nations have to a very large degree a predisposition to question our motives, our manners, and our methods. When that is said it is said with a profound appreciation on my part of the real worth of this land we respect and of which we are part and parcel.

Much of the caustic criticism of us, is curiously made by people who wish desperately that we were, in all such matters, worthy of their confidence for deep down inside, many of those who seem to despise us, really do not, but like the best of teachers, they criticise us severely because they want us to be worthy of our talents and our philosophy and our great opportunity.

As you very well know in the tensions and difficulties of the times we have not been on the side of the struggle for freedom on the part of the millions who have not enjoyed the freedom that is ours. We are identified as part of the "imperialisms" that have held the less privileged world in a kind of subjection, and we who are the "Western" peoples are for these who seek the advantages of the modern technical world, are also, in their minds always "The White".

This opinion has been brought home to me very forcibly by the statements in Redding's book and also in the correspondence with Sammy Lee, the famous diver, who has been touring, under the direction of the State Department Southeast Asia. Sammy, as you know is, along with all his family, a dear friend, and a graduate of Occidental College. When his father died I assumed a kind of responsibility for the family and in all his accomplishments, Sammy has been good enough to keep me informed.

His record in the Army, -- Major Sammy Lee, M. D., Medical Corps -- is a fine one. His love of America is perfect. He is a Korean American.

When he has appeared any place he has always called himself an Oriental from Occidental. He has a bubbling, charming personality and he makes friends wherever he has gone. In both Olympics, in Berlin and in Helsingfors, he was famous for his courtesy and kindnesss to all with whom he was associated.

He wrote to me and told me of an occasion when he was in one of the Southeast Asia countries where he gave exhibition diving. A young woman came up to him and said. "Are you an American -- really? " "Why yes, " said Sammy. "Well, said she, you are the funniest looking American Inever saw!"

Well so it was also for Saunders Redding, a member of the faculty of Hampton Institute.

Here are two priceless ambassadors, who see us as we are, who are of us, who are of the minority groups, and who recognize that the difficulties of the citizens of our country of other than white faces, are being faced and are being solved.

Now coming back to the tourists generally.

Also to the representatives of our country generally.

There are some wonderful exceptions and the matter I bring to you is that there may be a general characteristic of our travellers which is that of these wise, kind, sensitive, decently modest representatives such as Sammy and Saunders Redding.

Where do you come in.

(1) Your great company of the believers. Let them grapple with this problem.

(2) Some one of your advertisers might prepare a well worded pamphlet, perhaps written by Ed, or Saunders, or someone else to be placed in the hands of all who receive a passport, calling attention to the ways in which they can properly interpret us in their casual contacts, and such.

(3) Perhaps some of the scholars well informed could prepare special pamphlets for pre-orientation for those who plan to visit countries where the tension is great. Americans should know that from every land we have received into the flow of world civilization cultural creative forces which reveal our mutual indebtedness.

This from "An American in India".

(He writes of a conversation with an American student with whom he road from Vombay to Poona)

"The American girl giggled and remarked that at first it was funny having to remember to wash your teeth in Seltzer water, but after a while it got to be a bother and then you grew impatient with India's total disregard of even elementary sanitation. She said she tried to remember that India was a backward country and to make allowances, but this was hard too when the Indians themselves would not admit that their country was backward, and when they were always finding fault with America".

There is much in that little comment, -- to ponder.

(4) You might get into correspondence with Bob Blum and work out a plan for the preparation of travelers who, now in the thousands, trip about through these recently emancipated countries, and thereby bring about a better mf weaving of those who seek good and not evil.

Note; Bob Blum is sending me a list of the representatives of Free Asia, (Now the Asia Foundation) who are located in these various countries.

(4) Would it be possible to have a series of experimental broadcasts in which people like Bob Blum and Martin Flavin, and you, and a host of other thoughtful and informed persons could say something in praise of the various counbbies of their visitation. I believe in Austria — Why? - Not done with any unction, or a kind of inverted superiority, but with the evidences of real mutual respect.

At this moment I am interrupted in writing to you by the barking of Jeanie. There is a couple at my door. Ernst Huber and Frau Huber of Wagrain, Salzburg, Austria! They appear with a letter of introduction from Rosario von Warten of San Francisco. I will enclose her note for it relates so definitely to what I am writing you on this matter.

I am also enclosing the folder telling of the Ernst Huber Exhibition at the Palace of the Legion of Honor in San Francisco. They will spend a few weeks in Los Angeles, some days in Santa Barbara and then return to Austria. They will take our greetings to Sighartstein.

Such good talk....

They speak no English and I am so glad that I am at home in German.

Note:

Bob Blum told me that when the Soviet Embassy was opened in Jakkarta, that the people of Indonesia were astounded and delighted for the entire group arrived completely at home in the Indonesian language!

How is it with our representatives who are stationed in foreign lands? "Few take the trouble to be familiar with the language of the land in which they are so stationed."

That is too bad. Perhaps you can do something about that.

(5) Ed gathers from time to time the experts in his broadcasting family from the ends of the earth. Severeid, Lasseur, Smith, Hottelet, Schonbrun, etc. And they confer and comment on how it is in the various countries. I wish they would sometime do a broadcast, a See it Now or some kind of a program before the summer season sets in, directed to the consideration of the travelers about to take off to other lands. That might help.

(6) I wish very much when you are in Rome you would see that Tony Freeman at the Embassy takes you to see the Overseas School. There is a gathering there of the children of Americans who are in the various government and industrial positions in that country. So much can be done through the children.....

That is enough for now. Your mind works with such keen imagination and I am well aware that this matter of the hundreds of thousands of trippers and what comes of their tripping must be something with which you are also grappling.

With best wishes,

Affectionately

PS Mrs. Gribbel is about to take off for another visit to Europe. There is an American who leaves a trail of good will and understanding wherever she goes.

Mr. Fulton Freeman,
The United States Embassy,
Rome, Italy

Dear Tony:-

New Years Greetings for you and Phylis and the family and may the year be bright and gay and full of love, mercy, intelligence, and the meshing of the minds and hearts. Might as well wish as much as you can!

I am writing to you at this time to bring to your attention to coming visit to Rome, for about ten days of Perter and Mrs. Ferrante of Monterey. You will enjoy them very much and you will see that they also meet Guglielmo Negri and I feel sure that he will want to show them the University.

Peter is a member of our leading legal firm (Hudson, Martin, Ferrante and Street), and has been active in the Music Society and in other ways in this fair spot. As you know we have a very large Italo-American population and Petter is their friend and always wise counsellor.

The Ferrantes are making their first visit to Italy. The family come from Sicily. I have an idea that Peter has been sending a lot of money to the relations on that island in Palermo and vicinity.

Also Peter is a very good friend of Allen Griffin and I want him to be sure to see the Overseas School and to know the full story of it, for as you know I intend to do anything I can to add to its strength and value, for it is one of the links in the chain of a very good endeavor.

Peter will be at the Hotel Mediterreano -- however you spell it!

I will send a copy of this letter to him and he will send you when he has it worked out his itinerary.

I am reading a very important book, "An American in India", by Saunders Redding. Martin Flavin wrote to me from London and said that he regarded it as a "must" for all who seek to know, understanding and cooperate in bringing the world to decent composition. I do not know Redding but I certainly intend to know him.

This is my first letter to you for the New Year. But there will be more. I am even thinking of spending some money and getting an electric typewriter for I could certainly use one.

I hope we can get to Europe and be with you during September and October. Ted ~~Ebb~~ Ogden, a friend of the Hudson Valley, has most generously offered us the use of his Jaguar which he keeps in Paris, and that would help. But if we come it must be with some kind of proper sponsorship, and I wish that the idea would occur to some of the agencies responsible for this world weaving. That is all for now. Take good care of my friend Peter.

Affectionately

No. 7. Scientists!

I have just listened to the President's speech, "The State of the Nation". Very impressive. Stirs me up. Among others comments he said in part, that the preserving, protecting and advancing of the nation was something for which, "everyone must do his part".

So!

You and I, in our several stations, using what we have in the napkin, seek to do our part.

I bombard you, -- you the man of great influence, imagination, belief, drive and experience, word wide, -- and dollars!

This morning I want to direct your attention to the very grave situation with reference to the supply for our government and our economy of the men of science, in all the sciences, right across the board!

Recently there has been a meeting of the various learned groups in Berkeley and I have read what has been said and have had some correspondence with the members up there known to me.

Please note the enclosed material which has come from Prof. Joel Hildebrand, President of the American Chemical Society. Also I am sure you have read what Dr. Vannevar Bush has said, and probably count him as one of your friends. These are two top Olympians and they know.

The problems;

It costs a lot of money to carry through the necessary education for the sciences.
The need of the best brains, adequately trained, increases with tremendous rapidity.
The service of men of science in the government operations has been made less attractive by the careless inquisitors.
Many of the most important in the laboratory, the industry, the government, and the university would not be here if the McCarran Act had been a few years ago in operation! Fermi, Slizard, Einstein, -- for example.
The public -- the thoughtless public, the public influenced by the propaganda of evil ones, now looks on the men of science with suspicion.

The men of science, "seeking the truth and going where the truth leads" are suddenly confronted with the fact that they have released the energy of the universe and that it has been applied to destruction, and that in thehands of the careless, the fearful, the hating, the evil ones, it can obliterate humanity.
They now must be aware of political matters, -- which have been hitherto alien to them.
They must concern themselves with the moral responsibilities of their finding and their releasing.
All this must happen in a world in which there are those who are bent on the destruction of our free-wheeling, adventurous, and truly democratic society.
While the government and the schools for the preserving, protecting and advancing of that free society are not able to offer the compensation which industry offers, -- this in addition to the result of the careless inquisition, presents a very real problem.

And it is possible, -- here the great dream! -- that this power so released can make the deserts to blossom as a rose, can given health, security, opportunity to the areas of the world inadequately provisioned!

Now where do you come in?

Obvious, isn't it?

You have marshalled a great host of believers.
You work with Ed Murrow who sees this problem and this opportunity very clearly.
You represent many very powerful and rich industries.
You are what you are, able, smart, wise and imaginative.
You have increasing world influence.

And I remind you again of the words of Florence Nightingale.

REPORTS ARE NEVER SELF EXECUTIVE

Also "Knowledge is hard. It is harder than action! But knowledge must precede action, and action can produce tragic results unless it follows ~~action~~" KNOWLEDGE

I don't know why it is that I keep dinging away at you. Its a mystery to me!

Being a strong believer and on your list, I have a hunch, that I am myself driven by some unseen force, that propels me to such action! Could be!

Whether these letters do anything to you or not, they do to me, and they help me to get my own thoughts in order as I enter this year so potent for good or ill.

Please note the two addresses from John Jay Hopkins, an industrialist who applies the new power and who apparently sees beyond the hedges. He should say his piece. Jay is a son of my official household!

Coming back to the President's fine address, you will recall that he touched on this point himself, and said that in one of his statements giving more detail he intends to speak on the subject of federal aid to education. I hope he will have good advice on this point.

Something else, — As you know there is now this organization of the various corporations of this country for assistance to higher education. Persons like Messers Olds, Fairless, Abrams, etc. have led out in this and I believe the organization has now as its executive William Compton. Please look into this.

But the lure to the training for the exact sciences needs to be made more alluring.

And you, the stimulator of believers, can well give your thought to this matter.

What do you think of Jay's addresses?

I sent your itinerary to Rome. I hope you can be present for the "unveiling". It was in Rome that Dr. Fermi had his early training.

It was from Hungary that Dr. Slizard came.

It was from Germany that we received Dr. Einstein.

Dear Ed:-

How you do keep up our spirits!

One of our neighbors and very dear friends is Clare Kummer, the playwright. As you doubtless know she is the grand niece of Henry Ward Beecher.

She has a very special whimsy in her humor and is a constant delight.

This book on Bible rhymes she allowed her friend Will Gillette to print some forty odd years ago! I found a copy -- she had none! and we read them with much profit to our souls. Helen thought this one would especially please you, --

The closing linesoof another are

"Creation was a great mistake,--
The kind beginners often make!"

Take care of yourself.

July 9, 1951

Dear Remsen:

First of all my grateful appreciation for the notes and telegrams of encouragement I have received from you and Helen in the course of the last few weeks. This is written from our Log House in Duchess County on the first day of my vacation and somehow I could not feel at ease or restful without saying to you my best thanks. You know how much your encouragement means otherwise you would not indulge in it. This I think is a rare quality because so few people appreciate the potency of abuse or praise particularly when it is aimed at friends who love them.

Now for a few weeks I shall keep silent, read a few books and attempt to recharge the batteries. After that I shall be off to Yugoslavia or Iran or some-other place where what I suspect is wholly unimportant and transient news is being made. There is I expect, even in a suto interlectual life, something that could adequately be called an interlectual flywheel that I think you are to me, and I am grateful.

Dear Ed:-

Along with many million inspired listeners we were with you on that hour broadcast and greatly thrilled. I can see where an idea you have entertained for a long time came into reality. It was very impressive and should prove in every way a success.

We got home pressing along just ahead of the blow and the blizzard and we have memories now of how it looks in every corner of the land.

I found a note from Nate Halpern which I am enclosing together with my answer. If you see him you might tell him of our talk about him. He looks like another one of these driving and believing young who will do what their elders declare is impossible.

Helen joins in expressing our appreciation of the hospitality of Janet and yourself. You were both weary of many demands and that you took time to visit with us was a supererogatory work for which we are most grateful.

Now that we are again in a national emergency we are thankful that we have your analysis.

With best wishes for you all,

Dear Nate:-

Thank you for your letter. I wondered how it was with you. We were in the East for a few months and I tried to get in touch with you. In fact Ed Murrow said he would arrange it, but he got involved in so many basic responsibilities that I din't have the heart to urge him!

I want very much to keep in touch with you and know what you are doing.

Right now I am in the spell of this very important address of Governor Dewey and I am wondering what I can do to add to the practical power of what he has said.

I wish I had seen you. There are several persons in New York who are among my friends who would be delighted to know you and what you are doing.

I wish you would read especially the paragraph on the use of films and other audio visual edvices to make the world aware of whatvwe are really like. There are tremendous agencies for such a cause and yours is one of them.

We are planning, if the world doesn't crack up, to be in New York this coming Fall and will then, I hope, have better luck in seeing you and planning with you.

This copy of a letter to Francis Noel will indicate my interest.

I wish for you the best.

My dear Mr. Wilson:-

May I join with the millions in thanking you for your readiness to serve the country in this position of fundamental importance.

May I also put my name down on the list as one ready to be of any service where I may be of use.

You will be interested to know that I began my "career" as office boy for George Emmons, who later 25 years later! became a trustee of the college of which I was President, and when he died it was my responsibility to have the care of his funeral and give the eulogy, so richly deserved.

My story is in "Who's Who" and I am well known to Dr. Guy Snavely, Executive Secretary of the Association of American Colleges. I think I could be of help in the marshalling of the resources of "audio visual education" and in the work of organizing for Civilian Defense.

Gerard Swope, Jr., will know something of the work I did in the training of the V12 group and in the building of a group competent for civilian defense in Los Angeles. Occidental was chosen as the place of such training.

This is a time in which every effort must be made to clean the country of fear, suspicion unwarranted, and disunity and the strengthening not only of our resources for war but also the quickening of our faith. We shall get no place by picking a scape goat. Our hope is for all of us to ask the question "What is my job?" and "Let me be aware of our rich heritage and how it has come to us out of great tribulation."

God bless you and care for you in the work which you are about to do for the mobilization of out things and ourselves.

My dear Mr. Mullen:-

In reading the Chronicle I thought of you and our conversations.

Suppose you were under the spell of Russian Propaganda what you would do with the enclosed page.

This waywardness of youth, this lack of moral integrity in many homes, this carelessness of our people represent our tragic vulnerability.

The way of American enterprise is not going to be saved by millions spent on soap operas and Hopalong Cassidy. It may be saved by marshalling the resources which are available to teach, to give understanding and wisdom, and to awaken our faith.

Its not going to besaved either by picking some scapegoat living or dead and blaming him for all that is wrong in the world.

The first job it seems to me is well outlined by the comment of the Christus about the beam in one's own eye.

I have read and re-read the prophecies of Habbakuk. Take your Bible and read them and substitute for Israel, USA and for the Chaldees, "Russia".

I note in Dewey's helpful diterrances a comment on the use and the distribution of documentary films. That's one place where I come in.

Please note the copy of my letter to Mr. Charles E. Wilson. You know both Howard Dunham and I got started in the low rungs of the GE ladded — I much the lowest. This old 19th Century chassis and outmoded engine belongs to the country. I hope it can be used.

Helen and I are spending a two weeks in Springfield, Ill. with her mother. We read in the Register that you were not able to fill your speaking engagement here because of Ill health and that Larry Lasseur was substituting for you.

We don't like to read such statements in the press.....

We are en route to New York via Kentucky. Adele Buckner has gotten me all wrought up concerning the family papers and the border heroes and their heavy hearts in the hour of great decision! So we want to take a look at some of the battlefields and to visit the home of the great General-Governor where he was born in 1823 and died in 1914. Buckner and Grant is a fascinating subject and I'm looking into that too.

Anyway we shall be in Greenwich about the 14th and will give you a ring and hope very much that we can see you and Janet and that the tale of illness is used wholly in a Pickwickian sense.

Thanks for your letter. We are delighted that you are coming out here at the end of this month. Of course we want to be on your time and have some talk.

Helen joins me in urging you to take off a day or two or more and make us a visit here in Carmel. We have ample accommodations and would love it. If you can bring Janet and Casey that would be very grand!

Carmel is at its best and I don't need to enumerate its various diversions.

Besides I'd like to talk with you on this subject of "harnessing Hollywood". There are great strides being made in the use of audio-video devices in the schools and they certainly now afford us the necessary means of informing everyman.

I have constituted myself a kind of liaison and have had a very good and encouraging experience. Certainly the whole effort is in the focus of your own understanding and leadership.

I want very much to have you talk with Commander Francis W. Noel, Chief of the Bureau of Audio Visual Education for this State and now President of the Department of Audio Visual Education for the National Education Association.

What's this careless inquisitor, McCarthy really trying to do. If he keeps calling people like Doris Kenyon, Philip Jessup, Albert Einstein, etc. "communists" and "communist fellow travelers", he'll make some of us anti-communists think there is something in it. He is the perfect dupe of the tough people who would promote our collapse. How they must laugh!

Let us know as soon as possible if you can come and when.

Dear Ed:-

Thanks for your letter and the booklet giving the pictures and the substance of the broadcast. What I wish I had was a record or better film of the occasion. It was so significant that it should be in every school library and heard by every thoughtful group in the country.

I wish I could talk to you. There is so much that bubbles up from somewhere inside me concerning the use of these new devices in the art of education. There is a focussing of the subject in Southern California. You see there are present camera experts, top drawer learned people at Cal-Tek, the Huntington, Occidental etc., artists like Agnes Moorehead and Charles Laughton, this new company with much energy and understanding (The Beaudette Enterprises), and school people who are way out ahead such as Commander Noel, chief at Sacramento, and Margarete Divizia in charge of LA Schools audio visual department, etc. etc.

Much time is wasted in the work of learning that can be cleared for advanced work by the use of film and record and such.

What is needed is a council of the users, the makers and the distributers.

But you are on your way to London. When you get back more of this if you wish.

I'm sorry Lyman is not to be with you. Morse Cartwright has bought a lot in our paradise. Why don't you?

THE HAYNES FOUNDATION

THE HAYNES FOUNDATION is an organization which devotes itself to research and education. It was founded and endowed by Dr. John Randolph Haynes and his wife, Dora Haynes, who were active and progressive citizens of Los Angeles during one of the city's important developmental periods (1887-1937).

The Foundation attempts to reflect directly the interests of Dr. and Mrs. Haynes by focusing its resources on the fields which particularly concerned them:

1. Problems in economics, government, and sociology.
2. The specific application of these problems to the Los Angeles area.

Within this framework the Foundation has been active since its founding in 1926 in sponsoring research, publishing its findings in both academic and popular form, supporting pertinent research of others, developing a special library in its area of interest, and carrying on a program of community education.

Research

The following research projects, made possible by Haynes Foundation funds, indicate the kind of problems being explored by the organization:

- The economic resources of the area and the directions in which its future growth will occur.
- Comparative manufacturing production costs for major industries in six industrial areas—including Los Angeles.
- How the behavior of business cycles varies among the same six industrial areas.
- The effects of business cycles on the political and social problems of this area.
- How the populations of areas within Los Angeles differ from one another in terms of social rank, urbanization, and segregation.
- The history of the labor movement in Los Angeles, presented in a three-volume study which traces the movement's growth from its beginnings in the latter decades of the nineteenth century to the present time.
- The governmental structure of the Los Angeles region; the complex interrelationship between the city proper, the county, and other municipalities.
- The facilities of the Los Angeles community: its physical assets; how its people work and live; its problems and how they are being solved.
- What it costs a moderate-income family of four to live in Los Angeles, and what a typical budget for such a family would be.
- The city's need to rebuild its blighted areas—with a detailed plan for the redevelopment of one section of those areas, Chavez Ravine.
- What this state's experiences have been with the California Unemployment Insurance Act; what it means to the employee, the employer, the community.
- What problems have been presented by the changes in size and composition of California's population during the eventful 1940-1950 decade.
- The special interest of this area in the economic and sociological needs of the aged, as reflected in its experiences under the Old Age Assistance program.

Some of these studies have been completed and reports based on the findings have been published. Others are still in progress.

Fellowships and Grants-in-Aid

The Foundation is interested in helping graduate students and young faculty members in California colleges and universities who are undertaking studies which are closely related to the Foundation's own research program. To aid such studies, the Foundation annually awards several fellowships of $2,000 each to candidates for doctoral degrees and grants-in-aid of $2,500 each to faculty members.

Dear Nate:-

I have received several interesting communications from you among them a very welcome Christmas card. I would like to write you at some length but am not sure where I may find you.

If this letter arrives, will you drop me a note. Please tell me what you are doing and what has happened to the brave idea which you sought to foster and enflame!

I know that the station was sold, but I feel sure the idea of a community communication system such as Ed Murrow envisioned is thoroughly sound.

When I hear a broadcast that has the imagination and meaning of that one in which he assembled his children from the ends of the earth, it makes me weep salty tears to think that after the broadcasting the story is ended.

That one broadcast alone should be done in book form and placed as a document in school and public libraries and fixed permanently in the library of congress and elsewhere.

We seem to be getting somewhere in this State in the drawing together of the various formal and informal agencies for sound learning and good living and I have written myself out on the subject in some recent letters to Mr. Paley and his henchmen. I have a "vocation" as you know in this matter and am in danger of becoming a fanatic!

Please write me and tell me how it is with you.

REMSEN BIRD

Dear Ed:-

We listened to the broadcast of the children in Brooklyn enrapt! Really to think of the inadequate teaching of geography in this time when geography should almost be the main theme and when there is available such marvelous supplementary aids in the audio visual devices -- is to make one weep!

As younknow this is a matter of great interest to me and one which I should like to discuss with you at considerable length. We seem to be getting some place.

I have just picked out of my file a letter which I wrote some time ago to a very able uncle of mine who looks after the personnel affairs for the American Surety Company. Sponsoring programs of television, radio, animated cartoons and such which can be used over the air and then made documents for school use is something which the great industrial organizations should give some thought.

The Beaudette-Roach Enterprises, a venture in the field I am describing, have invited me to be a kind of consultant and I certainly am a busy correspondent in the endeavor.

Commander Francis Noel, Director of the Bureau of Audio Visual Education for this State is now the President of the Department of Audio Visual Education for the National Education Association.

I could bombard you with a lot of documents but I won't this time!

I'm so glad that Kenneth Holland has been elevated to the direction of the International Education affair which you gave such warmth and color.

Please note the enclosed to Henry Dreyfuss. You can use the quotation from Plato over CBS, sponsored by that delicious spagghetti -- for nothing!

Dear John:-

Thanks for your letter. I have arranged with Mr. Beaudette for the luncheon at the California Club, Wednesday, December 7th, at 12:15 o'clock. We will be there waiting for you.

I am not sure if I sent you my "Needle in the Haystack" document. Please find enclosed a copy with comments penciled on the side by Commander Francis Noel Director of the Bureau of Audio Visual Education for the State and now President of the Department of Audio Visual Education for the National Education Association. I would appreciate it if you would give this document your consideration for I think it can be a focus for our conversation.

I had a very nice letter from President Marriner of the American Book Company, who tells me he will be out here after the turn of the year. He plans to have me on the docket. I am strongly convinced that the Book Companies are very important in this endeavor.

Did you hear Ed Murrow's broadcast of the children and the little girl speak of her geography book being so inadequate? What an opportunity there is right now for inspiring teaching of this subject by the use of these devices.

Bob Cleland has worked out for Mr. Beaudette a series of studies on the unfolding of the drama of Freedom. Please note what Mr. Beaudette says of him.

Dear Jack! We are, I think, arriving!

It will be very good tossee you and to introduce my friend who is in a position to do a cause good and incidentally himself!

Affectionately

Mr. Henry Dreyfuss,

My dear Henry:-

Thank you very much for including me in the preview of the new telephone. It looks like something that is practical and right for its purpose and that would please Socractes, no end!

Quotation from the Crito;

Crito; But you see, Socrates, that the opinion of the many must be regarded, for what is now happening shows that they can do the greatest evil to any one who has lost their good opinion.

Socrates; I only wish it were so, Crito; and that the many could do the greatest evil; for then they would also be able to do the greatest good, -- and what a fine thing this would be!

I am glad that we shall have an opportunity for talk with you and Bob. I am convinced that a moment is arriving when all these scattered forces dealing with the necessary effort for the improvement of structural education can be brought to gether and focus on the problem and its possibilities. Bob has specialized in school construction and you are the top designer.

I carry the conviction that I can help in this process and especially in the marshalling of the forces of wide communication. "Hollywood" can also be harnessed and thereby help the many to do the greatest good, and what a fine thing this would be!

We are to be in Pasadena from the 4th through the 9th.

I wish you could have been at the little conference which Dr. Cleland arranged at Cal-Tek on this urgent theme. You would have been much inspired.

More of this when I see you.

My dear Howard:-

Your visit, you and Joan, gave us very great delight. We are well aware that you went to no end of trouble to arrange your affairs so that you could be with us. Something happened that was good and lasting, didn't it?

I was very glad, furthermore, that the conversation bubbled up in reference to this exciting matter of the marshalling of the devices of audio visual education for the Cause of sound learning and good living. Pursuant to your urging, — and I would do it anyway — I shall now proceed to continue the effervescence!

This is destined to be an unrestrained outpouring so you had better lay it down at this point if you have a pile of work on the desk and take it home and read it in your comfortable bed. I want very much to have you read it very carefully.

To this letter I am attaching various copies and originals of letters which will illustrate what I am emphasizing.

The first point is why am I so worked up on this subject and who am I who am so worked up, — in addition to being your proud nephew?

I am a believer! I recognize as a believing historian that we have through the centuries won some very valuable rights and to have and to hold the same we must be everlastingly vigilant, informed and dedicated to the responsibilities, without which dedication, the rights will go out the window.

The basic right is the right of a free man to function in a free society! Further description of what is a free man and when is a society free, we won't take up here. One evidence of the same is that you, an ardent republican, and I a democrat, are at this moment, with mutual respect, engaged in a common task!

Now if we are to have and to hold, we must be worthy in character, we must be informed, we must sense that we belong, we must be educated!

The instruments for such a situation are now, really for the first time, technically, everywhere available. That is very wonderful to contemplate.

Dear Allen:-

This letter seems to have become somewhat of a power in this effort. I have considerable of a file on the subject. Howard Dunham can be very helpful and will be. Would you mind returning this to me, addressing me The Huntington Hotel, San Marino, Cal.

Rem

It is my faith that the mechanical contrivances which could mechanize us can be brought to discipline and serve our highest intentions. This is a statement which can be elaborated in many fields. Our interest in this letter focuses, however, in the use for sound learning and better living of the audio visual devices. Therefore, let me sum up at this point this opinion and the zeal back of it in a sentence of one of my friends, a very successful business man; "Let's stop hating Hollywood! Let's harness it!"

With the above conviction, for several years, while President of Occidental College, I had the good fortune to receive a generous subvention for workshops conducted at the college in which the attempt to accomplish this end was made. We learned a great deal. We brought together representatives of various groups who were aware of possibilities, bottlenecks, problems, the inadequacy of production, the difficulties of distribution, and the necessity of training for use.

Let me divert;

If records, radio programs, motion pictures, animated cartoons, maps, charts, television technics, etc. are to be effective in the process of education for good living and sound learning, there must be profit for the industry, profit for the agencies of distribution, value not otherwise provided for the schools, and the preparation of materials by the counsel of all concerned. That does not exist anywhere at this moment.

But Southern California offers a unique place for just such essential collaboration.

Let me itemize what is there.

A public school system well aware and well organized. The head of the Audio Visual Department is Commander Francis Noel, who had the rich and most important experience of serving his country in the Navy in the preparation and use of audio visual devices.

The assembly of necessary talent — studios, actors, writers, technicians, producers, — in Hollywood.

The assembly of well integrated and interdependent educational institutions, where there is exceptional awareness and readiness to cooperate, viz; The Universities of California and Southern California, The California Institute of Technology, The Huntington Library, the private colleges, the public schools, etc.

All of this, I can illustrate at considerable length. I am attaching some letters revealing how true these statements are.

Coming more precisely to our recent conversation, — what has all this to do with you?

Now you are representative of a great corporation which bets its money on character and efficiency.

Education for citizenship is not only the work of the home, church, school, and other obvious agencies. It is the work of the great corporations. It is the work of all sorts of associations of Americans, all across the board.

The great corporations are recognizing this. They make films presenting their business. They seek to build ideals, understanding, ambition, esprit de corps among those who are of their several households.

Note the annual report of the Union Oil Company made in television shorts!

Let me give a specific practical illustration of what I am driving at!

Mr. Skinner, President of Oldsmobile Corporation, invited Col. Warren Clear, that wonderful hero, to speak to the automotive industry. This he did. Mr. Skinner told him that he would like to have him give the address "all over America"and that he would give him, naming it, a very beautiful honorarium. Col. Clear is not well. I have the address. It is magnificent. It would be a very simple matter to have Col. Clear deliver this address before a camera, making a "television short" and it could be presented over the air, everywhere, by Oldsmobile and then made a document for use in the schools, to be preserved in the archives, to be made available through the libraries. Very easy.

A big corporation asked Charles Laughton to do a television reading. This he did, of Shakespeare and the Bible. None could do this sort of thing better. It was very well received. Charles Laughton, Agnes Moorehead, and many other Olympian artists would collaborate with complete cooperation in such an enterprise.

One could go on.

Let me state at this point, that I am not in any way saying some thing altogether new! Just the opposite. This is a force becoming marshalled, recognized and advancements are being made all along the line.

To support this statement just pick up any issue of the "Audio Visual Guide", or the journal of the Association of Education by Radio.

Note these facts:

Teachers are being trained for the use of these devices.
Appropriations are being made by departments of education for equipment.
Schools are being designed for efficient use.
Many universities and colleges are at work in the field — Chicago.
The industry is cooperating with increasing appreciation.

My point is that Southern California offers a very special field for cooperation and the great corporations would be wise to seek out ways and means more effectively for the good ends they desire to cooperate with the schools.

It is my further point that this is a matter in which the American Surety Company would well take a leading position.

In closing this first outpouring, I want to say to you, that your nephew has had rather special opportunity to know the people and the places and to this effort for these ends he is at this chapter of his life devoted.

And if there is anything he can do to help, that he wants to do!

Now you will find in this envelope some letters, taken somewhat at random, from the files.

If you would like to follow up, I'm your nephew and your man!

Our love to Jean and for you,

Affectionately

My dear Palmer:-

Welcome Home! I hope you were not weighed down with the sheaves or engulfed with my correspondence!

Here is a letter from his Excellency, George V. Allen. This is something I think typical. Here is a man about to be thrown to the lions. The Balkans is a tinder box. We "Voice of America" the world but I think a careful program of film and redord production and distribution pointed at the schools and school teachers will help perhaps even more in explaining what is what in these United States. What do you think? Will you please return Mr. Allen's letter for I intend to follow up on this.

This month's "Audio Visual Guide" on every page seemed to have material germane to our theme. I have chewed it up and enclose some of the bits.

Also some pages from the Saturday Review of Literature.

These together will indicate what is taking place. The school world is awakening to the very great possibilities of audio visual education. It is developing selectivity. It is training its people. It is redesigning its school rooms. It is presenting education through a medium in which American young people have through entertainment developed high interest and sophisticated discrimination.

I become very much aroused when I think of two — excuse me! young people! — like you and Hal Roach getting into this work and surrounded as you are with all kinds of experts very anxious to help!

Henry Dreyfuss is now in Pasadena. We must get him over to the studios soon.

Dear Mr. Bird:

Your recent letter has been received here during Mr. Murrow's absence from the city. It will be brought to his attention upon his return at the end of August.

Sincerely yours,

If interested,-- read the enclosed!
Otherwise do not read the enclosed!

REMSEN BIRD

Dear Ed:-

I wish that I could talk with you.

As you know, I am interested in the marshalling of the forces of so-called audio vision for the cause of sound learning and good living. Much progress is being made in this direction, especially by CBS.

For a time I had a kind of consulting relation with Jack Kapp and many ideas floated about that did not come to earth. Some that did weren't anything to brag about.

In Southern California there is a combination of forces of expert quality which should be brought together in a kind of council. Viz; The Huntington, Cal Tek, The Western College Association, A top studio, Olympian artists like Laughton and Moorehead, CBS and Columbia Records.

In this State there is a very advanced group in the school world lead by Commander Noel of the State Department and Helen Divisia of the LA Schools etc.

Several years ago at Occidental we had a subvention for the doing of this sort of combination study looking to production, distribution and use. I rather imagine in the course of the years I have become rather especially alert and able myself to put in a word!

This was discussed a little with Donald Thornburgh. John O'Melvany is very much interested. There is an awakening of interest in "the spoken word" in the schools.

A tie-up with the publishers of text-books is a sine qua non. Mr. Alfred Harcourt is well aware of this and his man, Mr. Donald Meek. etc. etc.

I'd like very much to pour out my soul to the new man of CBS in LA. I am now completely free of any obligations to Decca and I am very zealous in this matter.

What do you council?

Affectionately

Dear Donald:-

Jack O'Melvany writes that you are leaving the fair South and will live and work in Philadelphia. What a loss to the community.

I hope and am assured that this is — strange as it may seem to a Californiac, progress along the road!

You will recall that you and I had many conversations in the years of my incumbency -- nice word! at Occidental concerning the marshalling of the forces of audio visual potential education.

Jack Kapp of Decca generously tied me up with Decca and I had much hope that something great and good would come of that, — but it didn't. I learned a little more of the intricate problems of the world of production and that helped me to understand, but I did precious little of any use to the business.

I have had many opportunities to talk with and work with a group of people who feel as I do and who see Southern California as an ideal place for the development of a council covering preparation, production, distribution and use, with profit financial for the industries and profit educationally for the schools.

If we are to have a working democracy we must have a people who are informed, educated, trained, inspired and accepting social responsibility. Or else we will go down in our fear and inadequacy. Having much faith I do not believe we shall go down. Quite the contrary.

The agencies with which you have been connected and especially EBS have been outstanding in seeking to use the devices of entertainment for the cause of better living and clear thinking.

I felt obligated for a time to Jack Kapp but am no more so. I have therefore written to our mutual friend Ed Murrow as enclosed.

I want to keep in touch with you!

Dear Jack:-

Thanks for your letter enclosing the one from Mr. Rackmil.

I am glad that you had a few days of refreshment and wish that you could have had more than just those six meagre ones!

I feel sure that there is a combination of forces in Los Angeles that can be brought together in a real organism for the Cause. But I also realize that you are a man with tremendous responsibilities and I don't think that you should have this added to the point where it may become a burden and irksome.

Why not just relax until the successor to Donald is appointed at CBS. In the meantime I shall follow in the path of my inescapable vice of letter writing.

We are just back from San Francisco where we have had a most interesting time with old SF friends. Anna Scott Newhall has built for herself a new house on her son Scott's land above Berkeley and Scott has been made editor in chief of the Sunday edition of the Chronicle.

Perhaps you read "Happier for His Presence", the new book on Robert Louis Stevenson. In it there is a photograph of Dr. William Anderson Scott who married them. The photograph is owned by his granddaughter Anna Newhall.

Robert Schad, I find, is interested in the Scott lore and has awakened an enthusiasm which died!

Take care of yourself and don't let my zeal wear on you.

My dear Francis:-

Thank you for your welcome and carefully wrought letter. I fear me that I must almost submerge you with my long and frequent communications on this matter which concerns so deeply both of us.

I should like very much to get your full ideas in discussion in reference to your reservation as to the practical working out of the sponsored television shorts. I have held a somewhat opposite opinion. This is to be a subject of discussion here presently with Mr. Skinner, President of Oldsmobile in reference to an address by Col. Warren Clear, the famous hero.

Also I think it would be possible to gather a group of counsellors of the top bracket in Southern California to work with Hal Roach studios, Paramount, or any other expert group in planning the making and the distribution and the use of the devices of audio visual education. However you are in all of this so far ahead of me that I use telescopic lens! We must discuss this point.

I have a letter here from Mr. Meek of the Harcourt Brace Publixhing Company. I think the book makers should give us the benefit of their technique and they should see the signs of the times.

I imagine I have had a somewhat unique opportunity to know who is who in L. A. and surroundings and I would be glad, — granting my liberty of judgment — to help anyone who wants to do constructive work in this field, either for profit or for the promotion of our hard won way of life.

Don't let my frequent appearance on your desk worry you.

Dear Francis:-

While in the South I saw a copy of a letter which your friend, Miss Grace Southwick, had written to you in reference to Mrs. H. B. Landreth. She is really a very remarkable woman with a combination of gifts and experiences which would fit her to be very useful in the field of our mutual interests. If you desire more information on this statement I will be glad to supply it.

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a rather lengthy letter written to Mr. John O'Melvany. I feel sure you know how very important his interest and drive can be in this endeavor. I would be glad to elaborate this opinion also if you want it!

Will you be good enough to return the enclosed.

I strongly urge you to make an appointment with him. It will greatly help the cause. I wish I were in the South when you are to bring the two of you together for that would give me much pleasure.

Did you see the article in this week's Saturday Review of Literature entitled "Ideas on Films"? It is well worth reading and shows the trends.

Henry Dreyfuss is very eager to make a contribution in the line of his special talent which is designing. He wants to work out a group of "fluid" class rooms. He wants them to be in use and he wants to watch them in use. He thinks that class rooms haven't had much creative thought since Peter Abelard!

The Paul Whitman broadside is very clever, isn't it? I should think he could do a whole set of such, -- Bible characters, Shakespeare, Dickens, etc.

I wish Laughton and Moorehead would do some records of the Mother Goose poems. That would be something!

As you know Paramount is entering "Television". You'd better see O'Melvany on this, -- he is their lawyer, -- as well as Beaudette and Hal Roach.

Dear Agnes:-

Mr. Rackmil has been out here, — perhaps you saw him. He talked with Mr. O'Melvany. He has written me a courteous letter but has made very clear that he does not think that an educational counsellor or council is needed for the promotion of the product of the recording company.

Decca has tied up with ABC for the sale of records and it is his opinion that is enough.

I agree that the book publisher connection is fundamental, but it is something different.

It is obvious to you, I am sure, that we have a unique combination of interests, educational, artistic and commercial, which joined together can produce and distribute to the advantage of all concerned.

Now I am completely free to say my piece where I will, and as your friend and "agent", I think the time has come when we should look into the possibility of "Master Records" made by Columbia and in fact the possibilities of every record and television producing company and that regardless of previous production and connection.

Do I have your green light?

Dear Charles:-

The enclosed copies of letters to Mr. O'Melvany and Miss Moorhead are self explanatory.

I seemed to be driven in this matter by some inner necessity. I realize that we have a remarkable and unique combination of forces in Southern California and it would be a shame not to hit while the iron is hot.

Apparently Rackmil did not get the idea at all.

I have been sorting out, throwing away and such and I have read over correspondence with you and Jack and others and it does seem as if we are losing time.

Miss Moorehead has asked me to be her "agent" in reference to all non-picture, non-stage performance. That I shall do and we have it all nicely set up. In some such relation I think I could be of use to you and the cause. This comes so frequently to you, you must be a bit irritated by now!

The financial side is of the least importance! If times are not too sweet for dollars, I don't care a particle. They go to the college ultimately anyway. But I want to have an official connection with you and Agnes and to be able to council, thereby, with some authority.

Let me know what you think about this "will" of Lounsbury. It may be old hat. It may not be as moving to the world as it seems to me. Your dry judgment is essential.

So.

My dear Ed:-

Thanks for your letter. I am so very sorry the Halpern deal fell through. It sounded to me like a very fine idea. Maybe later.

Helen and I are leaving to-morrow for a week or so in Santa Barbara and Pasadena. We will be part of the time with Albert and Margaret. They will be interested in your plans.

We are going East as far as Springfield, Ill and may go on to New York the last of April.

Euclid McBride spoke of seeing you at a dinner in your honor and of your invitation to Pawling. We'll be there!

I had luncheon yesterday with a group of experts on audio visual education. Commander Noel in charge for this state for the department of education is as smart as they come on these matters.

Henry Dreyfuss has been asked to be consultant by the Pasadena School system in working out a group of experimental rooms for the more efficient use of these devices. What a chance!

When you think of the proximity of the Huntington, Cal Tek, the studios, the Group of Colleges, the western mind which is open on such matters, the artists, writers, etc., and with the State Department, about the only one, in fact the only one, requiring all its teachers to understand and to be able to use these technics, --- its sort of logical, isn't it?

How very sad it is to think that those fine "Invitations to Learning", end with the performance! They should be made into records. They should be deposited in the school libaries all over the land.

I wish you and Janet and Casey could spent sometime here in Carmel.

Helen joins in affectionate regards for you all.

Dear Ed:-

Helen and I are back in Carmel. We had several happy occasions with Nate Halpern of which you are doubtless fully informed.

On the way home we spent the week-end with Albert and Margaret Ruddock. I had occasion for further talk with Albert on the subjectbof a possible interest in a radio station. I was interested to discover that at one time he considered purchasing one himself!

He is completely open for any talk that may be desired by your emissary. He liked him very much. He has many questions concerning the contemporary chaos in the world of broadcasting and such. But is in no way fixed in his mind.

I see, myself, a wide door open for some kind of an institution which can draw together the amazing concentration of talent which exists in Southern California, viz, -- the California Institute, the Huntington Library, the Carnegie Astronomical Observatories, Hollywood, the well founded non-tradition encumbered colleges, the chaos of dynamism Los Angeles, the flood of new emigrants, and the need and the daring, --- everything except the Forest Lawn Cemetary!

Coming back to Mr. Halpern. If Albert becomes one of your group he can very easily gather the kind of local prestige givers you may wish.

I forgot in my summary above to mention the Greater Los Angeles Planning Association. You, I think, would find it worth while to discuss this matter with the Industrial Designer, Henry Dreyfuss and the architect Mr. Harrison, who is active in the local planning. I told Henry Dreyfuss I would suggest this.

Count on my help, if you think I can be helpful!

London, August 12, 1945

There is no doubt whatever that the British press and public regard the Allied reply to the Japanese offer of conditional surrender as a civilised, reasonable document. It does not in any way restrict the Allies in carrying out their plans for the control and demilitarisation of Japan. The speed with which the four Allied capitals agreed upon the formula is proof that there was never any great divergence of views between them. There have been no public expressions of doubt here as to the wisdom of using the Japanese Emperor - at least for the time being. The Emperor is not promised any permanent tenure of office, and the statement makes it perfectly clear that he can be flung out at any time by the Allied Supreme Commander. So far as I can judge from the British press and from private conversations, there is no feeling that an important principle has been sacrificed, or that this means a soft peace for Japan. If the Japanese refuse the terms offered, then British opinion will not be revolted by the catastrophic destruction that will be caused in Japan. The best opinion here is that the Japanese Government will accept, although they may make another effort to secure a clarification of the Emperor's position under the Allied Commander. Such an attempt, if it is made, is foredoomed to failure.

For the last couple of nights there have been premature victory celebrations in London, but the whole temper of the people has reflected a combination of relief and fear. No one is trying to assess the relative influence of the atomic bomb and the Russian declaration of war in bringing about the Japanese offer of surrender. People are content to leave that argument to the historians. The editorial writers have been much more concerned about control of the bomb than about control of Japan. Secular history offers few if any parallels to the events of the past week. And seldom, if ever, has a war ended leaving the victors with such a sense of uncertainty and fear - with such a realisation that the future is obscure, and that survival is not assured. There is a widespread recognition that the agreement reached at San Francisco is as obsolete as the Gatling gun; and that the Big Few will have to think again if they are to devise any system which has even a reasonable chance of maintaining peace. President Truman's declaration that Britain and America will not reveal the secret of the bomb until means have been found for controlling it, brought no great reassurance. It does for the moment alter the balance of power, but such a solution is only temporary. Other nations by research and espionage are likely to solve the problem before we have mastered the counter-measures. The editorial writers who have been saying that we are faced with a choice between a new world or none at all do not feel that they are exaggerating. No one has expressed any confidence that an international agreement not to use this weapon would have any lasting effect. For it is impossible to ignore the fact that it has been used. Science has presented Statesmanship with a problem, and its successful solution implies a revolution in the relations between nations. It is not a new problem. Thoughtful writers have been presenting it for decades. It has merely gained an urgency. And it may be that fear, particularly on the part of those who have experienced even old-fashioned bombing, may spur governments to a solution.

We ought to be aware of the state of the world that is going to attempt that solution. The United States, Russia and the British Commonwealth have won, or are about to win, the terrible war against powerful adversaries. They joined forces because they were attacked or in danger; not because they admired each other; not because they agreed about the citizen's relation to the State, or about free speech or economics. All being in danger they fought together. None sacrificed or was asked to sacrifice political, cultural or economic autonomy. The three nations plus China created a world organisation. It is based upon power. They established a body of law from which they themselves are exempt. Conferences and consultations did something to reduce mutual suspicion, but much remains. The material and moral damage done in Europe alone cannot be calculated. There are millions in Europe who will be economically worse off next winter than ever they were under the Axis. Every estimate, official and otherwise, indicates that this will be the coldest, hungriest winter that Europe has known.

But the kind of world that is going to have to try and solve this problem posed by the scientists cannot be expressed by maps or statistics, shipping, slogans or internal transport, coal or food. The position is more complex than is indicated by any of those things. There is one fact which overshadows all others - vast areas of the world have become a sort of political no-man's-land. They are ruled either by armies or by provisional governments. The allegiance of the people is in doubt. Between one-third and one-half of the total peoples of the world have been promised solemnly and officially that their ultimate form of government shall be established by the freely expressed will of the people. That has been promised to Japan, India, France, Italy, Belgium, Germany, Poland. The question is not only will the promise be fulfilled, but if and when it is what form of government will they choose? They are confronted with alternatives. Many are hundry, near to desperation and disillusioned. There is cynicism and questioning in this political no-man's-land. Much of the territory has become an economic desert - old standards, old leaders have disappeared. The struggle for the bare essentials of existence is bitter. It seems probably at least that people will give their allegiance to the system of government that is able to hold out to them not only the greatest prospect of personal freedom, but also the fullest measure of hope for relief from their immediate difficulties. Some of them may choose Communism, others Socialism as Britain has done, while others may elect to follow the American pattern. All will undoubtedly be influenced by the examples set by Russia and by the United States. They will also be watching the middle-of-the-road course followed by Britain. The United States Government has given its pledge to many peoples that they shall have the right of free expression. It is a great obligation, and if it is not discharged the weight of the New World's influence will have to be measured in horse-power and machines rather than in ideas. I cannot see that there is any inevitable conflict between the United States and Russia. But there is conflict and uncertainty in the minds of millions in these devastated and liberated lands as to which system they should choose. That is a fact. I do not believe that their decision will be greatly influenced by food and other measures of relief, or by propaganda. They will be greatly swayed by example, by the system which achieves the greatest degree of economic equality, personal freedom, racial tolerance and social stability. Having given them our promise that they shall have freedom to choose, it is of the utmost importance that we provide them with honest information upon which that choice can be based; and that our policy in these countries should be represented and expressed by men with sympathy and understanding, and especially with a knowledge of America and its policies. This would not involve competition with Russia for the affections of people in foreign lands of which we know little. But it would mean discharging our obligation in their interests, and ours, to provide them with information upon which the decision could be based. For whatever the Big Three may decide, the people, including those in the defeated and liberated territories, will be heard from and their decision will affect the course of world history. And the example set by America at peace may be decisive.

London, October 31, 1943

There is absolutely no reason to believe that the Moscow Conference altered in any way the planned and agreed Anglo-American strategy. The Russian successes on the lower Dnieper may have done so, but the Diplomats and their advisors were not empowered to alter the existing plans. Anyone who talks of a mid-winter invasion across the English Channel has probably never crossed that Channel in mid-winter in peacetime. The Germans, however, have recently been putting out stories about great concentrations of troops, aircraft and ships along the southeast coast of England. They profess to expect invasion and their reasons are obvious. When it does not come they can reassure their own people that the strength of their defences prevented it; and when the invasion doesn't materialise the people of the Continent will be further discouraged and depressed.

When the Moscow Conference was called, the Germans began at once to stress the divergence of views between Russia and her Allies. The measure of agreement reached has in fact been considerable, and it was hoped here in London that simultaneous announcement, together with any comments by the three governments involved, might be arranged. That would have been the most effective answer to the German claims. The British, the French, the Dutch...all the other nations, might then have explained the outcome to their own people in their own idioms. As it is, the Conference has been labelled a tremendous success, and few people here expect it to live up to the advance billing. This has nothing to do with who was first with the news, or whether "tremendous" is the proper adjective to use in describing the first step of a long and difficult journey. But it has a great deal to do with creating expectations and arousing hope, and releasing a flood of rumour which will end in acute disappointment for many people in Europe. This reaction to the President's diagnosis isn't very easy to explain. Perhaps the best way to put it is to tell you that one European statesman who is no cynic said to me, not with bitterness but almost with envy: "Perhaps Europe's problems appear more simple when viewed from Washington." and he added: "In my country we are allowed to taste the wine before being told that it is magnificent." Nevertheless, the progress made in Moscow will comfort most people in this country, just as the continued Russian advances will, as the winter progresses, produce renewed demands for greater action by the Western Allies.

It is impossible to speculate as to where and when that action might occur. But one thing can be predicted with reasonable certainty, and that is that if our Continental campaign is confined to a winter of edging forward in Italy, there will arise in this country a great demand that something more be done in the way of planning for post-war Britain. The public interest in post-war planning is increasing, and it's interesting to note that most of it has to do with conditions in this country. The British have an Empire and world-wide responsibilities, but when you talk with them about the post-war world they generally discuss domestic conditions. I believe that in the public mind such matters as education, housing, public health, workmen's compensation, the future of agriculture - things like that occupy attention much more than do the frontiers of Poland, or the political constellation in the Balkans. Since his return from Quebec and Washington, Mr.

Churchill has been sensing the atmosphere of the country, and has been devoting a considerable part of his time to domestic affairs. The betting is that more Cabinet changes are in the offing. These changes will not affect the count after the war. They will be aimed at co-ordinating and centralising the scheme for post-war development. In other words, aimed at convincing people that something is being done about the many plans that have been put on paper.

There are plenty of cases in history where wars have been fought in part at least to make people's minds off domestic difficulties. During the coming winter a firm attack on domestic problems and on post-war planning may serve to maintain British unity, and reduce the amount of grousing that always accompanies a dark, cold winter when there is little spectacular military activity to divert people's minds from forebodings about the future.

The future of the House of Commons has been decided. The main Chamber, wrecked by boms more than two years ago, is to be restored in all essentials, and in the old form. That is the desire of Mr. Churchill who has spent more than forty years in the House - some of his critics maintain that that's what he wants to do with Europe....restore it in the old form, with a few minor alterations. But the decision to reconstruct the House of Commons reflects something that is an essential part of this country. It is the desire for continuity - the wish to preserve old and tried methods and procedure. One of Mr. Churchill's major conditions was that there should not be seats enough for all the Members. Only about two-thirds of the membership could find seats in the old House. It was small, ill-lit and ill-ventilated. The decision to restore the old Chamber will seem illogical to many people, but not to the British. The old traditions and the old forms die hard in this country. Mr. Churchill pointed out that if the size of the House should be increased, most of the debates would be held in an almost empty room. He wanted to preserve the intimacy and the conversational tone of Debate that has distinguished the House of Commons from all other legislative assemblies. A few people disagreed - wanted a more modern building - but most Members want to go back to the little rectangular room with the green leather-covered benches where so many mistakes have been made, and where so many historical decisions have been taken. In the course of the Debate Mr. Churchill slipped in one important sentence. Someone had been talking about the availability of men and materials for the reconstruction of the House. The Prime Minister remarked that in a year's time Britain might be looking for jobs rather than for labor. That's as near as he has ever come to estimating the end of the war...that is, the end of the European war.

In this fifth winter of the war people are naturally thinking of November, 1913....wondering whether Germany's unexpected collapse can repeat itself. Those who expect this to happen reason from precedent, as did those who expected this war to follow the pattern of the last war. The conditions are totally different. In the last war, in Germany and in Austria opposition to war began in the Fall of 1914. As early as 1917 the German Reichstag debated a peace resolution. The German Government had to introduce equal and secret suffrage. The Labour Unions were active in politics. There were strikes against the war. During the whole period there was Democratic opposition to the Imperial regime. Germany collapsed as a result of a long and developing process. The Russian revolution
